These conclusions have not been arrived at hastily or on insufficient evidence. Although space will allow only the publication of the details of one trial, it must be clearly understood that for some time past I have been making similar experiments and with like results. The meeting on the occasion here described was for the purpose of confirming previous observations by the application of crucial tests, with carefully arranged apparatus, and in the presence of irreproachable witnesses.

Respecting the cause of these phenomena, the nature of the force to which, to avoid periphrasis, I have ventured to give the name of Psychic, and the correlation existing between that and the other forces of nature, it would be wrong to hazard the most vague hypothesis. Indeed, in inquiries connected so intimately with rare physiological and psychological conditions, it is the duty of the inquirer to abstain altogether from the framing theories until he has accumulated a sufficient number of facts to form a substantial basis upon which to reason. In the presence of strange phenomena as yet unexplored and unexplained following each other in such rapid succession, I confess it is difficult to avoid clothing their record in language of a sensational character. But to be successful an inquiry of this kind must be undertaken by the philosopher without prejudice and without sentiment. Romantic and superstitious ideas should be entirely banished, and the steps of his investigation should be guided by intellect as cold and passionless as the instruments he uses. Having once satisfied himself that he is on the track of a new truth, that single object should animate him to pursue it, without regarding whether the facts which occur before his eyes are "naturally possible or impossible."

"Upper Tulse Hill, S. W.

"June 9, 1871.

"Dear Mr. Crookes,—Your proof appears to me to contain a correct statement of what took place in my presence at your house. My position at the table did not permit me to be a witness to the withdrawal of Mr. Home's hand from the accordion, but such was stated to be the case at the time by yourself and by the person sitting on the other side of Mr. Home.

"The experiments appear to me to show the importance of further investigation, but I wish it to be understood that I express no opinion as to the cause of the phenomena which took place.

"Yours very truly,
WILLIAM HUGGINS.

"Wm. Crookes, Esq., F.R.S."

"36, Russell Square,
"June 8, 1871.

"My dear Sir,—Having been present, for the purpose of scrutiny, at the trial of the experiments reported in this paper, I readily bear my testimony to the perfect accuracy of your description of them, and to the care and caution with which the various crucial tests were applied.

"The results appear to me conclusively to establish the important fact, that there is a force proceeding from the nerve-system capable of imparting motion and weight to solid bodies within the sphere of its influence.

"I noticed that the force was exhibited in tremulous pulsations, and not in the form of steady continuous pressure, the indicator moving and falling incessantly throughout the experiment. This fact seems to me of great significance as tending to confirm the opinion that assigns its source to the nerve organization, and it goes far to establish Dr. Richardson's important discovery of a nerve atmosphere of various intensity enveloping the human structure.

"Your experiments completely confirm the conclusion at which the Investigation Committee of the Dialectal Society arrived, after more than forty meetings for trial and test.

"Allow me to add that I can find no evidence even tending to prove that this force is other than a force proceeding from, or directly dependent upon, the human organization, and therefore, like all other forces of nature, wholly within the province of that strictly scientific investigation to which you have been the first to subject it.

"Psychology is a branch of science as yet almost entirely unexplored, and to the neglect of it is probably to be attributed the seemingly strange fact that the existence of this nerve-force should have so long remained untested, unexamined, and almost unrecognized.

"Now that it is proved by mechanical tests to be a fact in nature, and if a fact, it is impossible to exaggerate its importance to physiology and the light it must throw upon the obscure laws of life, of mind, and the science of medicine) it cannot fail to command the immediate and most earnest examination and discussion by physiologists and by all who take an interest in that 'knowledge of man,' which has been truly termed 'the noblest study of mankind.' To avoid the appearance of any foregone conclusion, I would recommend the adoption of some appropriate name, and I venture to suggest that the force be termed the Psychic Force; the persons in whom it is manifested in extraordinary power, Psychics: and the science relating to it, Psychism, as being a branch of Psychology.

"Permit me also, to propose the early formation of a Psychological Society, purposely for the promotion of the study by means of experiment, papers and discussion, of that hitherto neglected Science."

I am, &c.,
EDWD. WM. COX.

"To W. Crookes, Esq., F.R.S."

While we think the careful experimental investigations of Mr. W. Crookes, and his outspoken testimony as to the facts thereby elicted, stand out in favorable contrast to that timidity and apathy on the subject among men of science in general of which he so justly complains, it still appears to us that his labored tests add nothing of any value to our knowledge concerning it, and that if this be all we are to expect from science, when it goes into the investigation of "a new force," we shall not have much to thank it for. When we analyze Mr. Crookes' discovery, we find it amounts to this: that a crinoline cage, surrounded by 50 yards of insulated copper wire, and whether in communication or not with two Grove's cells, does not prevent an accordion playing tunes without any visible agency, and that with two eyes you can see it playing through the interstices of the cage. We should have thought, what we have always insisted on, that seeing it was enough, and that to perform this operation of seeing, anybody's eyes are as good as those of a Fellow of the Royal Society. So much for that experiment.

The next one is measuring the greater or lesser weight of a table in Mr. Home's presence. Thousands of persons, and ourselves amongst the number, have ascertained this difference in we get by feeling it, over and over again, and it has been repeatedly published as a fact on the credit of persons whose intelligence was quite equal to the task of saying when it was heavier and when it was lighter. It does not require an F.R.S. to preside over such a task, and all that Mr. Crookes has done has been to [illegible] this weight in one instance.

Then he and Dr. Huggins and Se[illegible] are so surprised at what they have not [illegible] that they must even christen the ph[illegible] a new name, and they are now to be dubbed the "Psychic Force." For the present we shall prefer to call it by its old name. Perhaps soon they will discover that the Bible miracles are true, and are a part of the same force. However, although in the interest of truth we feel bound to say what we have done, we are glad to see so much straightforward honesty and courage in a man who has so much to lose as Mr. Crookes. He is traveling in the right path, and is not oppressed by the prejudices of his class. All honor to him therefore.

We shall be glad to notice now how soon the blatant members of the Press, who have been calling Mr. Home an impostor, and the Tyndalls and Huxleys who have said that these things are absurdly impossible, will publicly apologize for their ignorance, and of speaking so wildly and positively of things they knew nothing about; but "against stupidity, even the gods themselves are powerless."

We may add here that about 14 or 15 years ago at a meeting of members of the Cooper Institute, New York, the testimony to the manifestations of "psychic force" borne by Professors Hare and Mapes, led to the appointment of a committee charged with a similar mission to that of the Committee of the Dialectical Society among ourselves, viz.: to inquire into the phenomena alleged to be Spiritual Manifestations. They did so inquire: they investigated the subject with several mediums, and among other facts they elicited, and embodied in the Report, was that of tables being made alternately light and heavy at request. They tested this by a pair of scales and weights, and the difference in weight was found to be nearly 50 pounds. This was told the writer by a member of the Investigating Committee, and who publicly stated the same at one of the Conferences on Spiritualism held at the Assembly Rooms, Gower Street, London, about two years ago.

FURTHER EXPERIMENTS BY MR. CROOKES.

Since the publication of his article in the Quarterly Journal of Science, Mr. Crookes has made some farther experiments with the "Psychic Force."

To do away with the objection that the contact of the hand of the medium with the lever in his spring-balance experiment might, by some inexplicable possibility, produce the observed results by muscular action, he tried the following experiment:—Over the center of the fulcrum he placed a glass vessel full of water, and by means of an iron stand, quite detached from all the rest of the apparatus, a vessel of copper was held so that it dipped into the water without touching the sides of the glass vessel. The bottom of this copper vessel was perforated with holes, in consequence of which it was partially filled with water.

When Mr. D. D. Home placed his hands inside the copper vessel, any force passing through his hands to the apparatus, had to traverse the water, hence no muscular action of his could have any effect upon the spring-balance. With the apparatus thus arranged, the lever oscillated as in his previous experiments, the average strain registered being three or four pounds.

Every depression of the index finger of the spring-balance, also depressed a wire pointer, so arranged that it could slide down a little brass rod. The result was that this pointer registered accurately the weight producing each depression.

Professor Hare, of Philadelphia, once performed an experiment nearly the same as this, but his experiment was less satisfactory, because he placed the vessel of water on the long arm of the lever, in a place where the immersion of the hands would cause a certain amount of strain to be indicated by the spring-balance.

While Mr. Crookes was trying the above experiment, it occurred to him to ask Mr. Home to put his hands on the table, but not to touch the apparatus at all, under these conditions, the lever moved as before.

Mr. Crookes has also tried some more experiments in the presence of some friends, amongst whom were his brother, and Mr. Durham, teacher of chemistry and physics at the City of London School. The medium was a private lady. The weight experiment was tried without the basin of water. The medium put her hands on the short end of the lever, where any pressure would have decreased instead of increased the weight registered at the other end of the lever. He put his hands on hers, to see that she did move them. The other end of the board went down at least a dozen times, taking about four seconds for each oscillation; most of the movements were equivalent to about two pounds, but occasionally there was a stronger one, the strongest registering 6½ lbs. Everybody present watched the medium and her hands. The fingers were at the extreme end of the board, and were never near the fulcrum. Once or twice the end of the board, under the fingers, rose with the fulcrum from the table, whilst the other end was being pulled down.

The same accordion used in the experiments with Mr. Home, placed key-end downwards, when held at the other end by several of those present in turn. This playing was done beneath the table. Then the hands of all present were placed on the top of the table, and the accordion floated about under the table with nobody touching it; all the hands were visibly on the top of the table at the time. While the accordion thus floated, it sounded strong notes and discords, but played no tune.

NATURE'S HAIR RESTORATIVE is the result of four year's study and experiment. It is now perfection itself, and no more to be compared with other preparations now flooding the market, than "tanglefoot" whisky is to pure Bourbon. See advertisement.

ANCIENT MAGIC, WITCHCRAFT, AND MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

A Farewell Oration by Mrs. Hardinge, delivered in Hope Hall, August 9th, 1871.

All that have ever studied the page of history with that candid and accurate attention which enables them to analyze something more than a summary of the facts recorded, know that in every age, in all countries, there has been a line of strange and unaccountable history permeating the external law—a silver thread winning its way throughout all human evidence, ever manifesting its presence at some period or in some place. By this mysterious influence has the world become enlightened. Allowing that there can be anything supernatural—assuming that above the visible universe in which we live there can be aught which the great Creator has not included in the order of nature—what is this super-nature? How do we account for it? There seems to me to be three classes of thinkers: the first knowledge a portion of this supernaturalism—a portion which has existed in one period of the world's history, and which has not been demonstrated in one place alone; this they call religion. They attribute a certain interference with nature to the Great Almighty, and determine that at the time when this interference took place, miracles were wrought for the purpose of revealing to men the religion in which they believed. All the rest of the history of the "supernatural" is ignored by this class of thinkers. They put it aside as either of no value or having no existence. The second class are those that acknowledge, like the first, that some special revelation has been vouchsafed by the Great Spirit, allowing to men an opportunity of connection with his soul, receiving some token of his presence and the ministry of angels; but as to other forms of supernaturalism, whilst they acknowledge its phenomena to be true, they consider it to be evil, wrong, or caused through the dark side of nature; and the third class disposes of the whole history of the supernatural by denying its existence altogether, assuming there never was a miracle, never was a revelation—that there is nothing but the visible universe—that matter fashioned its design and outworks its own destiny. Now, these are the three classes of thinkers to whom, for the most part, are entrusted the teaching of the world in spiritual beings. There is a fourth class, and it is to that which I shall call your attention to-night. It is a class of persons who acknowledge that in all ages, and in all times, the same Spirit has manifested his presence, revealed his laws, instructed man in various forms and teachings in different countries at different times—in a word, that the Great Spirit and his messengers have never ceased to reveal themselves to man, although he has accepted that revelation only in accordance with his degree of knowledge. Of that fourth class your speaker stands this night as a representative, and it is in the hope that I may show you how, in three special phases of supernaturalism, the same demonstration has been wrought out at various times, but received by the world under different forms of belief, that I propose to address you upon "Magic, Witchcraft, and Modern Spiritualism." There are many other phases of this spiritual, or what is called supernatural, belief. It is a vast realm—a theme which includes all your religions. It is this which instructs us in immortality, and opens up the world of spiritual forces within yourselves anciently called "spiritual gifts." I cannot hope, therefore, in one brief discourse to do more than the extent of these varied revelations.

MAGIC.

Let us, in the first place, question, What is, or what was, Magic? We assign to-day a terrible occult meaning to the word, and have come to think that it was a sort of imposture or a delusion. There are, indeed, some who undertake to include all forms of religion under the term Magic, but to those we shall make no further allusion. When we question whence magic arose, we find that the magicians of old were priests. We are asked whence came a human priesthood, and we are referred back to the first great dynasty of which we have any historical record in ancient Hindostan. There we learn that in those vast and primeval solitudes in the Himalayan Mountains, surrounded by the grand and glorious phenomena of nature, the wild winds and the rushing storms, the earthquake and the tempest—by the burning sun of India and luxuriant foliage which inclined the mind of the ancient Hindoo to the study of metaphysics, were the men retired into the ancient forests, there leading ascetic lives, and devoting their minds to the contemplation of the great and sub'ime in nature. They necessarily became recipients of inspiration, which we call "spiritual gifts." They were known as healers of the sick, as prophets in dreams and visions and in different forms of inspiration. They conversed with invisible beings. They received those grand and stupendous revealments that enabled them to instruct those who sought them. There is no question that these antique sages were simple, earnest, and faithful believers in the highest and most sublime revealment from heaven which they possessed; and as the multitude looked upon them with that superstitious reverence which naturally inclined them almost to worship them as footprints on the boundaries of two worlds, these ancient priests began to realise the value of the influence which they exercised upon the people. They became very rich; they dealt out the sublime and occult knowledge which they professed at high cost. They taught their votaries the necessity of offering presents for alms—hence sacrificial rites. Rich offerings were laid at their feet, and thus the first priesthood. Now, we know there was a priesthood which was called by the Jews the Order of Melchisedec. The baptism of spiritual fire, the true prophetic gift, fell upon that individual from inheritance, but could not be purchased with a price—could not be transmitted from father to son—could not be received by a mere ordination of the hereditary priesthood. The consequence was, that when these ancient priests found that their office was very profitable to them, they naturally desired to transmit it to posterity. Finding they were unable to do this, they had different ways of procuring these gifts by artificial means. We learn from the ancient writings of the Hindoos that they discovered the virtues of plants, drugs, and vapors, for producing supernatural phenomena. They began to realise the nature of magnetism; they then perceived the possibility of controlling the human mind by what we now call psychology, and thus they established the system of artificial necromancy, fascination, enchantments, and all the various arts by which, through drugs and vapors, the magnetic sleep was induced, forming the basis of the most famous art of magic. We learn this not only from the Jewish Scriptures, but also from the Hindoos themselves. They were a very tenacious people, and for a thousand years their arts and processes were practised from generation to generation, as they still do in parts of India, amongst the modern Hindoos, these very arts which so amaze the traveler, and which are in reality only remnants of the same lost art of magic; and when we come to question the foundation of this art, we find it to consist solely of magnetism and psychology, or the power of man upon man by the virtue of drugs and other agencies. When we thus review the nature of magic, we find it was a stupendous knowledge of the properties of magnetism and psychology. These practices are now disallowed. Were we now to offer to instruct the world in the art of magic we should be consigned to the nearest lunatic asylum, and meet with the treatment visited upon those who are of unsound mind. But when we put forth the announcement that by electro-biology we shall enable one person to influence the minds of others, or when we announce that with the aid of electricity we can produce results by invisible force to work strange feats, we are scientists, but not magicians. Nevertheless, when we question the secret of ancient magic, we find it is one and the same thing, only that magic fell into disuse as the priests of India ceased to practice it. This is the first basis of our position.

Now take the next. We are informed that magic was a foul practice, a diabolical art, and that it was a resentment from the Great Enemy, and was for the purposes of evil practiced only by Pagans. But when we question why these practices were held in reprobation, we find that they were invariably denounced by some other sect who had not the power of the magician.

WITCHCRAFT.

In the second place, What is Witchcraft? We are approaching a little nearer our own times—in fact, we are treading closely on popular opinion. It is no new thing for your speaker to be questioned how far she dares to assert spiritual communion in view of the terrible denunciation of Moses, "Thou shalt not allow a witch to live." In the face of Isaiah, who charges us not to seek of the dead for the living, let us ask, What is the line of demarcation between Witchcraft and Modern Spiritualism? Magic, as an art, passed away with the dynasties of India and Egypt. They, however, transmitted some of their knowledge to the Jews, and this was perceived in that remarkable volume called the "Cabala," but little known beyond the circle of learned Jews. In this volume we have a vast amount of information concerning the methods of culture of occult forces. We are taught also the method through which, by special "mutterings," we can by clairvoyance discern the future in precious stones. We are also taught the method of holding communion with the dead. Spirits are thus said to be invoked in the volume called the "Cabala." Now, the Jews are acknowledged to have been extremely ignorant, and submitted to the most gross and great delusion. We find that when we come to trace the origin of the priesthood, it was derived from the priesthood of Moses, who founded the order of priests and derived his information from the Egyptians. When we compare the system taught by Moses with the ancient Magic of the Egyptians, we find they correspond very closely. The Urim and Thummim was, in fact, a consultation of the twelve rods of those who were instructed to read how the law shone in this stone were enabled, as they supposed, to read the future. Casting lots was one of the priests' practices; another was by the "Daughter of the Voice." This was a method by which the priest, standing in the porch or entry of the temple, listened to the conversation of the first passers by, and interpreted this as oracular. But many of the Jewish partook so closely of the ancient Egyptian rites that it is a marvel to those who read the book why the Lord should have imparted these to Moses, who was already instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians.

The first direct allusion we find to witchcraft is in the writings of Moses, who commands, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." When we take this text, and place it in approximation with Isaiah, who denounced "those who peep and mutter and resort to the dead to seek the living," then we find it resembles the ancient writings of the 'Cabala." Thus, there was White Witchcraft, which was practiced by the priests. Black Witchcraft, again, was practiced by the uninitiated—by those who were not in the order of the priesthood; in fact, it was a sort of private priesthood, which received inspiration or gifts, just as we do to-day, without any authority. It opposed itself to the regular stereotyped mode of the Jewish priesthood, causing jealousy and leading to persecution. When Moses commanded with the Egyptians they are called Magicians, but he calls the Priests of the Lord. The phenomena which were produced by both were therefore the same, and up to a certain point they prevailed with Moses.

When practiced by the people, it was Witchcraft; but when by the priest, it was Religion. Take, for instance, the fact that Jacob Abraham, Isaac, and others beheld spiritual beings, and received messages of high import from them. Joseph was not only an interpreter of dreams, but was a diviner. Balaam represents what might very fairly be termed the ancient trance medium. He falls into a trance, has a vision of the Almighty, speaks unpremeditated words. He pronounced a blessing when he came to give a curse. He was not selected for any especial moral qualities, but he was endowed with a peculiar gift. The prophets of Israel had the hand of the Lord upon them. Sometimes they were made to instruct the people through visions. They were sometimes made to predict the fate of Israel—Isaiah for instance, and many other of the prophets. What power was this? Oh! not witchcraft. These were the authorized religious men of the day; but when we come to the unauthorised woman—when we are pointed to the Woman of Endor who predicted the fate of Saul, who foretold the destiny of Saul, even as Samuel did when he himself was on earth—we are pointed to a witch. Now let us endeavor to find the demarcation between Samuel and the Witch of Endor. We find that Samuel heard the voice, Samuel perceived spirits, Samuel prophesied the future, Samuel conceived himself inspired by the Lord; Samuel, in a word, was a man of God. Thus we have a right to suppose that if he passed from the grave he was the same good Samuel that had left this life in the odor of sanctity. So long as Saul was obedient to God he was recognised as a prophet. The time came when Saul was disobedient, and from that time the power left him. He banished from the land witches and all who had familiar spirits, though we are not informed where the distinction was between the witches and the prophets. One remained—the Woman of Endor; and Saul, in despair of being able to receive any of those answers which had so far guided him on the way, or any of those directions which had formerly spoken Divine truth, Saul suddenly bethought him that the evil people of the land banished might answer his purpose very well if he could only find one. We do not hear that this woman practiced any arts. We do not hear of any enchantments, any divination, any sacrificial rites, any blessing upon the altar-pieces, as Abraham did, and waiting for fire to consume them. We hear of nothing but the fact that the spirit of Samuel was called in the presence of Saul, who believed he appeared, though the woman alone perceived it. Did not the prophecy then given come to pass? And now, as we search those passages of Scripture, this is all the description of the "witch" we can find; were it not for the denunciations from the pulpit, we should hardly call the woman a witch. Taking, therefore, the high authority of our clerical teachers, it is clear we have arrived at that time when we stand face to face with the modern "witch" in the form of Spiritualism. In the Woman of Endor, we are not informed what she did wrong; we are merely told she was a "witch," and as what she prophesied came to pass, it was a true prophecy. But little more occurs to us; but little appears in the history of humanity concerning witchcraft. The cry "Religion" takes a very strong hold on the world. One of the most notorious cases of the trials for witchcraft occurred since the famous Order of Knight Templars. We are told that this order was at last broken up for witchcraft, and that Guy was executed with great ignominy for the practice of witchcraft; but little is stated concerning the nature of the witchcraft, and we can only suppose the Knight Templars saw and heard spirits, and that this constituted the crime of witchcraft. Happily for our research, the records of some of these trials for witchcraft still remain. Charles the Second and others collected a very notable account of them. They have bequeathed to the world quite a collection of these trials. Some among them are familiar to your speaker, who has visited the scene of such trials in New England. In the first place, it was remarked that children were the first to be affected with a strange malady. We are told that a great number of children screamed, whistled, and represented the most curious appearances. Sometimes they barked like dogs, and always represented themselves as under the influence of some known person who was accused of having the evil influence, or being a witch, and having put a spell upon them. In this way many persons were brought to trial, accused of having put the spell on these unfortunate children. We find that these persons were generally inoffensive, and bore otherwise a blameless character. We find there is some magnetic influence which spreads like a contagion. We have yet to discover one single instance in which it can be shown that anyone had put any spell upon another more than that which has been claimed by psychology. When we ever we recognize good or evil, that which is impressive at a distance, this we call magnetic. In the trials in the Middle Ages which disgraced humanity, those who were accused of witchcraft possessed the gifts which in ancient times were called witchcraft, and now called Spiritualism. It is told that Satan played the pipes, toads and black cats were the dancers, and spectres stood round; but we have no photographic copies of what was done on those occasions, and these vague reports constitute all the accusation that can be brought against them.

Much depended upon the status of the people amongst whom these works have occurred. St. Paul says there is one spirit, but a variety of administrations, and he is the diversity. When this gift fell on any but the Jews, it was called enchantment; when it fell on the Patriarchs, it was the gift of God; when it fell upon the Judges, like Samuel, it was the voice of God—the presence of ministering angels. On the other hand, it was the gift of prophecy when it visited the Chaldeans, but it was sorcery when it came upon Daniel; it was the gift of God when it came upon the Apostles; it was the gift of the Master—it was the Divine gift—a message from the Sacred Presence. And now a few brief words concerning the last and third division of my subject—

MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

It has been with us, the Spiritualists, both in America and Europe, for some twenty-three years. It came with a power which was irresistible; at that time it was not known what a Spiritualist was—the name was not understood. Now on the continent of America we number millions, and the more I reside and labor among the European nations, the more general do I find this Spiritualism everywhere. It manifests itself in two forms—by physical and trance mediumships. Spiritual beings become material and speak with an audible voice. Many of these feats are undignified and seemingly unworthy of spirits. We contend that we must regard these as signs adapted to our low condition. For more than 1800 years down the ages have sounded the words of the Master that we should "give a sign of our belief" in our work. Many great manifestations have been even of a more undignified character—the divining cup of Joseph, the trance mediumship of Balaam, the cakes baked on the rock for Nahum, the cruse of oil of the prophet, and all the signs that were given in ancient times, and which formed the fundamental basis of the faith on which our belief is founded. I have given them with deep reverence, as the work of Him who speaks to our ignorance—who gives us these humble signs in advance.

We have the trance and the speaking medium. These, by a power they cannot resist, have gone from country to country, and with uneducated lips proclaimed the glad tidings of the opening of the spiritual senses—of the truth and certainty of this great communion.

Amongst those that we call, for the purpose of distinction, intellectual mediums, some have been endowed with a power and an eloquence that have been irresistible; and these "priests" are forming the germs of a new religion throughout the length and breadth of the land. These spirit mediums have been commissioned to proclaim the one God. All sects may come under this teaching. We endorse no denominations—seek no name. It is enough for us to know that the great problem of spiritual existence has been solved. We know there is an Infinite mind—a Master—at the helm, and him alone do we worship. Beyond all chance of doubt we know that we live forever. When the visible heavens that are now over-arching us shall have shrunk, we shall be living; when the mighty orbs in which we have passed away round this planet of ours shall have passed away, we do know that the words that are now parting our lips—that the thoughts we are now thinking—the deeds we shall perform to-morrow—the secret motives that are agitating our minds—we know that these will make our hereafter. These are the inner structure of our spiritual beauty, and according to our fidelity or perfidy we shall be happy or miserable.

The mightiest powers of the angels are engermed within you and I; and as we sow, so shall we reap the bright and glorious gem, immortality.

Letter from Harriet E. Pope.

BROTHER JONES—Exeter Hall and the other books came safe to hand, and after a careful reading, I must say that there is more to be learned in that small work than in any book of the price I ever read. If any one wants to know the foundation upon which old theology rests, let him get Exeter Hall, and read it thoroughly. I wish everybody, churchman and Spiritualist, would read it, for unless they were so blind they would not see, they would be the wiser for it. I want two more copies for lending, as soon as I am able to get them.

In visiting different parts of the State, I find a great many, even professed Spiritualists, who do not own even one book on Spiritualism, or even one of our weekly papers. Why is it? They could not support the physical body without food, and certainly we need food for the spiritual as well. We can hardly [illegible] JOURNAL arrives, and for [illegible] are many necessary than [illegible] ries of life.

But speaking of [illegible] avowed Spiritualists, who would rather take the Ledger than spiritual literature. It seems to me they had rather feed on husks than good, solid food.

Our cause is gaining slowly but surely, and we hope to have a grand rally in October, at our Annual Convention, and wish all Spiritualists in the State, and all others who can, to be present to enjoy it with us.

Morristown, Minn.

Letter from Mrs. E. M. Wolcott.

ED. JOURNAL:—Perhaps a few words from this chill region may interest your readers. I say chill, for the warmth of our philosophy has never been permitted to thaw the iceberg monuments of old theology, of which there are seven in this place. Of intelligence derived from books, there is plenty, this being the seat of St. Lawrence University, comprising three departments, theology, science and law. Two presidents and a worthy corps of professors shed the lustre of their knowledge upon the minds of something less than a hundred young men and maidens. Universalist in faith, early in opening its doors for the admission of women, this has been called the most liberal college of the country,—the same advantages, the same privileges awarded to either sex, permitting the iteration of the most radical views, rarely, if ever, expelling for the cause. Employing the best of talent, largely conversant with the later reforms of the day, as a few of the faculty are, and rigidly conservative as the remainder are, it is not singular that schisms arise, implying divisions of this, as of other bodies of sectarians. Indeed, one who is privileged to listen to their lyceum lectures, essays and orations, requires no far seeing power to discover the signs of the times as indicated thereby.

Of the many who go forth as preachers of the gospel according to Universalism, full one-half drop away into more lucrative employment.

Query :—Are they really called of God? "The course of nature" is [illegible]; the Bible, remarked a learned divine. The reason is obvious. The great mass of mind is struggling to be free.

Four years since I came here to educate a son and daughter, ever aweing, to the questioning mind, our knowledge of the glorious truth. Later there were others who dared give expression to their views. For a time, the clean, cheerful face of a spiritual paper might be seen side by side with the Star in the West, Christian Leader and other denominational papers, receiving no disparagement in the contrast, when suddenly we missed it; why, we could never learn. It is to be regretted, for many of the theologians read it with avidity.

In the dearth of Spiritualist colleges, we can heartily recommend this school, regretting only the lack of interest in the Faculty to obtain situations for the graduates who desire to become teachers. In this, the normal schools are preferable, as schools wherein the children of Spiritualists may become thoroughly educated.

As a Spiritualist—one who realizes that very soon the children of our cause will devolve upon our youth, I am proud to say that in spite of bitter prejudice against our belief, my daughter won the highest grade of scholarship for the four years' course in a class of ten, of whom five were young men,—one the valedictorian. She is now teaching in the unprejudiced the capacity of woman's intellect to receive and assimilate the mental food designed for her brother man. Eve long, they take their respective positions in the public arena,—the one as a teacher, the other as a student of medicine, leaving me alone and at liberty to labor in the vineyard of spiritual truth, wherever there is work to do, by speaking, reading character, describing spirits in public, as E. V. Wilson, or developing in private.

Money is of secondary consideration when compared to the earnest desire I possess of widening the circuit of my acquaintances in the spiritual field. So, stranger friends, I await your call.

Again—where better than from the white folds of the noble JOURNAL, and by the favor of its worthy editors, can I return thanks to the many dear friends who by their appreciative kindness, liberality and constant employment in the lecture field, have enabled me thus to carry out the last wishes of my noble, earnest souled husband, who for four years has mingled with the loved ones of the beautiful land,—for the education of his orphan children. To you, with heart felt gratitude my spirit turns, realising that thoughtime and space divide us not[illegible], I know the benison of thy love will be with me still.

A FINE TEST.

Letter from Dr. Abba Lord Palmer.

BROTHER JONES:—As a test in proof of spirit power, and that mediums are useful beings, I wish to relate an actual fact, withholding all names excepting that of the medium, for wise reasons.

A young lady, resident of the city of Moline, Illinois, inherited an estate in Canada worth some forty thousand dollars, and acting on that intelligence, she went to Toronto to get control of the property. Her friends received letters informing them of her arrival, and that in about three months she would be able to return with her fortune. After that, weeks and months passed on, and no letters came. Great anxiety was felt by her friends, and letters were written to a lawyer in Toronto whom she on arriving there, had entrusted with her business. An answer was returned by the lawyer, stating that she had married and left the city, but he did not know her address. This did not satisfy her friends; they continued to write to her lawyer, but no evidence was ever given. At last, an uncle, I believe, came to Dr Wm Henry Mitchell, who is a very active and intelligent healing medium of Moline, and requested that he be entranced and tell him all he could in the case. In reference controlling the medium said that the niece was not married, but was confined, not by force, but by circumstances; described the lawyer, his apparel, even to a seal ring and cuff buttons, which he said would be presented to him.

This was all taken down in writing, and is now preserved as evidence of the truthfulness of the spirit, for the uncle and Dr. Mitchell soon after sent the writing to Toronto, as directed by the control. They stopped one day in Detroit, then went from there to Toronto, sought an interview with the lawyer, and found the description of the two men correct,—seal ring, cuff buttons and all. But, strange to relate, the parent of the lawyer knew nothing of the young lady's business, but had seen her in the office. This caused a tremendous quarrel in the law firm, and a dissolution of the same, the uncle taking the papers from the hands of the lawyer, and placing them in the hands of another, and in the care of the United States Consul.

Soon after, they set out for the [illegible] they could ascertain only the [illegible] that she was married, but her [illegible] unknown.

The doctor was controlled and [illegible] one day in Detroit, on their return.

They arrived there at night, and put up at a hotel. The next morning they went out for a walk. The medium, in relating the incident, said, "I never felt so like walking in my life. I hardly felt my feet touch the pavement."

After walking some distance, Mitchell darted into a candy store without speaking one word,—the uncle following more deliberately, wondering what the medium should go into a candy store for. Just as he crossed the threshhold, whom should he see but his long lost niece standing behind the counter.

Joyous was that meeting, and the angel world who found what mortals without their aid could not have found.

These facts can be authenticated on writing to Mr. Bull, of Rock Island, Miss Sarah McLinden, or C. P. Mitchell, of Moline. It has created a great sensation in the city, the orthodox clergy, and satisfaction to the Spiritualists. When this all settled satisfactorily, I will then give the young lady's side of the story and the names of other parties.

Truly is the latter text true, that we have from heaven to earth that we read of in Jewish history, has never been withdrawn and angel visitants bless us with their guardian care. This I feel to acknowledge in the work that angels have appointed me to do.

In Geneseo I met with many noble and ardent workers in the cause, and formed many new and warm friends. May they ever grow less, is my earnest prayer.

Dr. Allen is doing a good work in healing in Geneseo and vicinity.

C. H. Doty, of Atkinson, is a fine speaker and lecturer, and I hope that spiritual societies will place him in the lecturing field.

In Rock Island I gave many tests of spirit presence, many saying it was almost like talking face to face with their departed in my stillness. Readings of character, with statements of facts concerning past and present scenes, gave perfect satisfaction.

New Boston, Ill., Aug. 1st, 1871.

Letter From Della E. Dake.

BROTHER JONES:—Quickly the chords of sympathy are attuned when we are called upon to contemplate human suffering in any form, and how readily the call of duty responds when the sufferer is one near and dear to us.

Six weeks ago my husband and myself left Chicago with the intention of visiting the prominent cities in Michigan, hoping in each to leave some practical proof of the efficacy of spirit power in healing the sick.

While in East Saginaw, and before we had been there long enough to meet many of our brothers and sisters in the faith, our plans were frustrated by the Doctor receiving a telegram from Rochester, calling him immediately to the bedside of his father, Prof. O. M. Dake, of that city, who upon our arrival, we found suffering from a sudden attack of paralysis, unable to speak, or move without help, pronounced by his attending physician, as by good recovery. When danger calls, the spirits are prompt to save. By their timely aid, and with means ever at hand, the Doctor was able to aim so instantly relieve him, and thanks to the "laying on of hands," he is now rapidly recovering. It is in such cases, and at such times, that the soul gives homage to the unseen forces that surround us, and guide us through the darksome causeways of life.

The 12th and 13th of this month we were present at a picnic and grove meeting of Spiritualists at Avon Springs, and as I glanced over the goodly number there convened together both for pleasure and profit, with the grand blue dome of heaven for our canopy, the choral anthems of joyous birds for music, and good old Mother Earth our footstool, I thought, what better or more fitting place for the worship of spiritual truths do we need? Why ask for costly halls? In these not more breadth and freedom of thought in thus gathering together under Nature's grand old forest trees, without form or ceremony to hamper or impede the soul's progress?

Several speakers were present. Among the most prominent were Prof. J. G. Fish and Dr. E. L. Lyon. The two day's meeting of Saturday and Sunday was a success. Hundreds of the prominent Spiritualists in Western New York were present, giving proof that Spiritualism in this section is not dead, but lives, and will live, so long as eternal ages roll with their ceaseless weight of truth, which is always triumphant.

"It is not a child of only yesterday, nor today, but of to-morrow, ever progressing, and growing into the fullness of a power that no church priest or pope in their ignorance can annihilate.

We formed many pleasant acquaintances, and met many old friends of the Doctor's. A large concourse of outsiders were also present, and it is hoped, will profit by the example, and gushing emanations of truths propagated. In the evening a large number congregated in the spacious parlors of the Avon Cure for a social interchange of thought, and to commune with the Spirit World—many visitors at the Avon Cure for the first time witnessed a spiritual scance.

The Avon Cure is under the management of Spiritualists; the hotel accommodations under the supervision of the gentlemanly proprietor, Mr. W. P Smithworth.

The wide-spread reputation of the sulphur springs needs no further comment at our hand. Indecements were held out to Dr. Dake to take charge as chief physician of this noted cure, but his extensive practice in the West would not permit of its acceptance; and although this section was his former home, and the beautiful Valley of the Genessee his birth-place, no inducements would turn him from his adopted home in the West. "It is not that he loves the East less, but that he loves the West more," and to-morrow our faces are again turned toward the Father of Waters.

Rochester, N. Y, Aug. 27. 1871.

Letter from Dr. D P. Kayner.

As previously announced in the JOURNAL, I lectured last Sunday (Sept. 3rd.), at the Patten School-House, on the line of Ogle and De Kalb Counties, morning and evening, to crowded houses. My subject in the morning was, "The Lessons of Spiritualism"—in the evening, "Life."

Notwithstanding that a Protracted Meeting had been started immediately after my former lecture, and to head off the influence of the truth I had presented to the people, and to keep them from coming out to hear me again, and had conducted it upon the regular hell-fire principle, to make it effective. The school-house was crowded, and anxious listeners were gathered about the windows.

This protracted effort had been organized and carried on at the Chronkhyme School-House, in the town of Franklin, De Kalb county, about three miles north of the Patten School-House, and in the evening—Sunday—their minister told them that all were attending my meetings were "on the straight road to Hell."

If he is like most of the ministers "we read of," I presume he understands the complete topography of that country, and the nearest route to reach it.

But the "Rev" gentleman had overshot his mark. A lady, who had attended my morning lecture, arose, and informed the Meeting she attended my lecture in the morning, and did not think she was any nearer Hell for so doing, and if all would preach as pure doctrine as those she heard there, and live up to them, "the world would be the better for it."

But this is not all. It has aroused a spirit of determination in the minds of the liberal people, and they have resolved to carry out the defense of their "inalienable rights" at all hazards.

It was unanimously "resolved, that Dr. Kayner be engaged to continue his lectures," and as the Patten School-House is too small to accommodate those desirous of hearing the truths of immortality as given through his organism, we will hold the meetings September 17 h, at the Chronkhyme School-House, at which time I propose to survey "The Road to Hell."

"Thus the work goes bravely on." Immortals are giving evidence of their individuality in my presence, when emotions are favorable, and demonstrations of clairvoyance, so we are every day presented to the people after truth. The clouds that heretofore have hung heavy and black, are being parted, and Heaven's own light is streaming through the rifts. As Bro. Wilson says, "God is good, and the angels are our helpers."

DO IT DOWN.

BY HOOD ALSTON.

The world is moving onward—
Do it down—
To a grand harmonious union—
Do it down.
Darwin's latest revelation,
Maintaining evolution,
Will cause a revolution—
Do it down.

Man must his brother own—
Do it down—
From the cottage to the throne—
Do it down—
Of every clime and nation,
Complexion, race, or station.
We are surely blood relation,
Do it down.

Education is advancing—
Do it down;
Arts and sciences enhancing—
Do it down;
Universal emancipation
Goes along with education;
'Tis heaven's ordination—
Do it down.

Religion must keep pace—
Do it down—
Or be beaten in the race—
Do it down.
No mysterious revelation
Needs teach us our creation
Or final destination—
Do it down.

Reason's lamp is brightly glowing—
Do it down.
Freedom's stream is onward flowing—
Do it down.
The time will shortly be
When humanity is free—
A blessed unity—
Do it down;

Free from ignorance and sin—
Do it down—
Grand and beautiful withal—
Do it down.
The "coming man's" the goal
Of the immortal soul,
As eternal ages roll—
Do it down.

ED. JOURNAL:—The above is copied from the St. Louis Democrat of August 13th. There is something more than ordinarily good in "Do it down." It is truth in a nutshell, and we ask a place for it in the JOURNAL, from which emanates so much that it does, so much that tends to progress. "Reason's lamp is brightly glowing," and it shines for all; it is Spiritualism—the new light that is to drive away the darkness of superstition and ignorance. God bless you and your associates in your efforts to keep that lamp "brightly glowing."

Spiritualism is ahead of everything else. The JOURNAL is as much sought after in these parts as was the good man Jesus sought after by his disciples on the shores of Galilee eighteen hundred years ago.

YOUR FRIENDS IN STAUNTON.

Staunton, Ill., Sept. 6th, 1871.

Copy of Correspondence in Reference to Spirit Pictures.

Mr. Carter—Dear Sir:—I saw your letter to Mr. Doherty, and as I am skeptical in regard to Madison Doherty's spirit pictures, I would like to have answers to some questions. As an artist, and want to get to the bottom of this matter, and hope you will assist me.

1st.—Did your artist, Mr. Wilson, take the camera apart, examine that there were no microscopic lenses or glasses for reflections?

2nd.—Was the bath examined, and were there no openings to receive negatives, or transparencies?

3rd.—Was the tablet examined at each sitting, that no transparent or negative was used in it?

4th.—Was the background watched so carefully that no confederate could aid during the exposure of the plate?

5th.—Were the plates used old or new, and did they belong to Wilson or Doherty? Had the plate ever been used on which the spirit picture appeared?

6th.—Was Doherty's person examined to ascertain that he had no means for tricking?

7th.—Did Wilson, the investigating artist, perform all the manipulations, prepare the plate, develop the picture, etc?

8th.—Did Wilson develop the picture in the dark room without Doherty's presence?

9th.—Was your investigating artist entirely competent and above suspicion of confederacy with Doherty?

Respectfully,
WM. C. THOMAS.

Crawfordsville, Ind., July 19th, 1871.

Reply:

Mr. Thomas—Dear Sir:—Your letter, hereto attached, was duly received, and I have called on Mr. Wilson, and herewith present his answers, which, of course, will be mine also:

1st.—He examined it thoroughly. It is one of the simplest construction. He says there was nothing in it or about it different from one ready for the ordinary work.

2nd.—It was and is a common bath glass dish, inserted into a close fitting wooden box, stands on the table in the dark room, and is movable. We carried it out into the light, took out the dish from the box—it contained nothing but a fluid and the "dipper." There are no openings of any kind in the wooden box, except, of course, the end which receives the dish. It is absolutely impossible to attach trickery in connection with the bath.

3rd.—It was fully. Mr. D. did not handle it from the beginning to the close of the test; there was nothing in it nor about it that does not belong to it for common work.

4th.—It was. Mr. Wilson stood facing it at each sitting and no head appeared, nor was the background moved from first to last. It is also one whole piece. In its rear it is a solid brick wall, neatly papered.

5th.—The plates were new. Mr. Wilson took them from the little box in which they came from Mr. Crapo's, the photo furnishing store. He used six plates. They had never been used before. They were Doherty's plates, having been recently purchased by him.

6th.—It was not. (See answer following.)

7th.—He did everything from first to last.

8th.—He did. Mr. D. never entered the dark room at any time during the test. Mr. D. did one thing only,—that is, during the exposure he stood near the camera and held his hand over it, but not touching it.

9th.—I so consider him for the following reasons:

1st.—He has, perhaps, the largest gallery in the city.

2nd.—He has had fourteen years' experience in the photograph business.

3rd.—He is by nature an honest-hearted man.

4th.—His character for honesty is beyond question.

5th.—I have been acquainted with him for years; having been not only his attorney, but for other branches of his family, and selected him because I believed him beyond corruption.

6th.—He is not now, and never was, a Spiritualist.

7th.—He is a modest man, and a deep lover of truth. He says now he can not account for, or give any explanation of how the picture came on the plate. The sitter never moved from his seat. There were six trials; that is, six plates were prepared and exposed, as for an ordinary picture, and the spirit picture appeared only on the sixth plate, while Mr. Wilson was in the dark room. Mr. Doherty sat in a chair similar from the side of the camera, in presence of the sitter.

I am anxiously investigating this matter, as well as yourself, and you can depend on any other manner of testing fully I will be happy to avail myself of it. I have the honor of subscribing myself, yours for the truth, and death to humbug.

THE NEW PATENT.

Letter from Mrs H. J. Andrews.

BROTHER JONES: Being an old subscriber for the Banner of Light, I am not a regular reader of your paper, but see an occasional number, and hear it well spoken of. I believe there is about an even number of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL and the Banner of Light taken at this office, and as I am heart and soul a Spiritualist, I like to have all our papers prosper. Long may they wave over this so-called land of freedom,—even till we are free from theological chains.

We are not strong enough to have regular speakers, but occasionally one passes this way. Our literature in the shape of papers and books is doing its work. By the way, I see MRS. Waisbrooker's "Alice Vale" and "Helen Harlow's Vow" in your Book List. I have read them both, and can hardly say which I like best. Each is best for the purpose for which it was written: "Alice Vale" to illustrate Spiritualism, and "Helen Harlow's Vow" on the social question. And being in story form, when they get among the young folks they are pretty sure to go through the neighborhood, and the comparisons and illustrations contained in them are so plain and pointed that those who may read are not likely to forget. But while both are good, it is of "Helen Harlow's Vow" that I wish more particularly to speak, for I honestly believe that could it be read by every young woman in our land, it would save thousands from sinking to the prostitute's hell (earthly hells I am speaking of),—there is so much strength in it for woman. I have a copy of it, and it is going from one to another all the time, and church people, as well as others, say, "It is the best thing I ever read." Mrs. Waisbrooker has been staying in this place through the summer, trying to regain her health, so as to be able for active service again, and tells me that she is feeling so much better that her courage is good to "try, try again."

One other item of interest I must give you, in reference to a grain-binder, patented by a Mr. Hottridge of this place. Mr. Hottridge is a Spiritualist, and something over two years since a grain-binder was shown him. The impression has gone abroad that spirits showed it to him, but he does not say so, for he saw no one at the time, only saw the machinery, though he has seen spirits, or persons looking like men and women in the form at other times. Had his binder proved a failure, the enemies of our beautiful philosophy would have rejoiced, and it proving a success, every principle having been demonstrated, it, of course, has its influence in our favor. Mr. H. has had the usual fate of inventors to contend with—want of requisite means, but finally men of wealth became interested, and the binder—one to bind grain with straw and make its own band—will be before the public as soon as the necessary steps can be taken for manufacturing.

By the way, have you seen any "psychic force" flying about your way? It is really laughable to those who have witnessed these things for years, to see the scientific world waking up, as if from a Rip Van Winkle sleep, and calling upon other Rip Van Winkles to investigate this wonderful force; of course spirits have nothing to do with it.

As my article is getting somewhat lengthy, I will close by bidding you God-speed in your noble work.

Charles City, Iowa.

Letter from H. C. Touner.

DEAR JOURNAL: On this beautiful Sabbath morn, with all the splendor of this glorious Kansas scenery about me, the broad, almost illimitable, expanse of rich, rolling prairie, checkered here and there with green groves, waving fields of grain, and peaceful-looking farm-houses, bright skies, tinted with soft, fleecy clouds,—amid all these soul-inspiring influences I sit down to hold communion with my many friends of the JOURNAL—for friends we all are, although we may never look upon each other in the flesh. Only four short weeks since we first became acquainted, and yet it seems as if we had been fast friends for a life-time. There is that in true Spiritualism which binds its followers in indissoluble bonds, which raises them above the trials, the petty cares and troubles, the animosities and all the discordant elements of this earthlife, and leaves them free to take and enjoy all the innumerable blessings so freely offered us, and to drink in to our full of the rich streams of light and knowledge, truth, purity, and beauty flowing in upon us so freely from the inexhaustible reservoirs of the spirit land. It is now nearly two years since I first witnessed spiritual demonstrations, and these were all of an ordinary character. They began in our own family, and, as we were all new in the business, we made some queer blunders. We committed the mistake of throwing open our doors to whoever would come, and as a consequence we had many large audiences of persons who came just to "have fun" or find fault, conducting themselves in such a manner as to effectually destroy all the fine spiritual harmonies of the occasion; but notwithstanding all this, we have had some seances of spiritual communion and enjoyment, which I love to look back upon. For myself, I accept the trust and nobility of Spiritualism without doubt or hesitation. I believe that when our Savior was here on earth he taught pure Spiritualism in its highest, broadest sense; that he was a living embodiment of all its purity and nobility, and the nearer we live to him, the more true and spiritually minded shall we become.

It is indeed one of the most beautiful and soul-cheering conceptions of which the spirit is capable,—the thought that our friends who have passed on before are not afar off, in some inconceivably remote heaven, swinging a palm-branch, and twanging a harp, but are right here, close by us, watching over us, and directing our movements with a calm, tender, loving vigilance that knows neither rest or weariness. If we could only be made to feel and to realize this glorious truth, what a source of comfort and consolation it would be to toilworn, careworn, heartsick, and homesick ones, "traveling o'er life's weary main."

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.

A MANUAL OF

SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

By Hudson Tuttle.

WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. PRICE $2.00; Postage 24c.

This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.

Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.

While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is waking the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every man's door.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE,

A Book for the Age and the Times,

and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.

You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet the arguments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.

It discusses the matter of Bible canons, versions, translations and revisions with ability, citing none but authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.

The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley

It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.

The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for nearly the whole of the first edition before it was published, one party alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.

THE Science of Evil;

OR

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION.

BY JOEL MOODY.

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION, and clearly shows that without Evil there can be neither Morals, Science, Knowledge, or Human Action on earth. In fact, without Evil, man could not exist. This work fully solves the PROBLEM, and unveils the MYSTERY OF EVIL, giving it a scientific meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES THE MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD.

The book is a large 12 mo., of 342 pages, printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy paper. Price, $1,75; postage, 20 cents.

MEDIUM'S DIRECTORY.

[PUBLISHED EVERY OTHER WEEK.]

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an unpaid friend to all free mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the locations of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time that we may keep their places of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so far forget their self respect as to speak evil of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are far their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register so soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulgence in such unkindness.

It should be borne in mind that "Seances visiting mediums carry con Pitons with "Passives—so to speak—which aid or destroy the power of spirits to control the medium visited; be it is that one medium gives satisfaction to certain persons, another better to others—all having their choice, and justly so, too, and all equally honest and useful in their places.

Health by Good Living.

BY W. W. HALL, M. D.,

Editor of Hall's "Journal of Health."

THIS book is to show how high health can be maintained and common diseases cured by "good living," which means eating with a relish the best food, prepared in the best manner.

The best food includes meats, fish, poultry, wild game fruits, and the grains which make bread.

The best cookery preserves the natural tastes and juices.

As there can be no "good living" without a good appetite, how to get this great blessing without money and without price, is pointed out, and, it is hoped, in very clear and plain terms.

Some of the subjects treated are:—

The object of eating: Power to work: Early breakfast: Dinner-time: Luncheon: Eating "down town:" What shall a man do? What shall fat men eat? How to get fat: Bad blood: Diet for the sick: Spring diseases: Children's eating: Forcing children to eat: Young ladies' eating: Cold feet and headache: Biliousness: A lazy liver: Mischievous tonics: The out-door air: Why are we dyspeptic? Discomfort after eating: Cole slaw: Certain cure of neuralgia: Nervous debility: Air and exercise: Food cure, etc., etc

It tells about

Luncheons and how to take them: Late dinners and how to take them: How drunkards are made at eating-houses: How girls are spoiled at boarding-schools: How health is lost: How home love is lost: How novel-reading ruins them: How love of dress is instilled: How young men are talked about: How bad matches are made: How good wives are made at home: How home influences purify.

"LA BIBLE DANS L' INDE."

BY LOUIS JACOLLIOT.

EXTRACTS FROM AUTHOR'S PREFACE:

"I come to show you humanity, after attaining the loftiest regions of speculative philosophy, of untrammeled reason on the venerable soil of India, was trammeled and stifled by the altar that substituted for intellectual life a semi-brute existence of dreaming impotence.....

India is the world's cradle; hence it is that the common mother in sending forth her children even to the stones west has, in unfolding testimony of our origin, bequeathed as the legacy of her language, her laws, her morals, her literature, and her religion.....

To religious despotism, imposing, speculative delusions, and class-legislation, may be attributed the decay of nations.....

.....Aware of the resentment I am provoking, I ye shrink not from the encounter.....We are no longer burnt at the stake."

TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Order, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN cents, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. ALL Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names entered on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them unsalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 15th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith, J.—15 Dec.—'70." If he has paid to March 10th, 1869, it will be mailed, "Smith, J.—10 Mar.—'69." The figures will stand thus: Smith J.—15 Dec.—0, or 10 Mar.—9; hence, the last two figures for the year, as '70 for 1870, or '69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 23, 1871.

Volume Eleven.

Our readers will observe that with this number we commence the eleventh volume of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

There has never a week elapsed during the time that this paper has been published, that it has not been faithfully distributed in the United States Mail for each subscriber, promptly, and sufficiently in advance, for it to reach its destined post-office in the United States and Canadas, on or before the day it bore date.

Our subscribers in foreign countries have been supplied with every week's issue, which, with the same promptness, have sped their way through foreign mails, to the eager souls who anxiously awaited them.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL by the force of intrinsic merit, has become an indispensable institution in this progressive age. It is demanded and weekly perused with care and undivided attention by the very best thinkers, wherever the English literature is read, throughout the world.

Here and there are to be found careful students of the Philosophy of Life in every enlightened country—to them this paper is indispensable, no matter what may be the length of time required to transmit it to them through foreign mails, when it comes to their hands it is ever a welcome guest.

To all readers of this paper, we give assurance that the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE is a permanent institution, beyond any peradventure of success; that while the JOURNAL stands thus high in the estimation of its many thousand readers, the works being published, are recognized books of inestimable value to this reformatory age. Our facilities for publishing are now equal to, and our works turned out compare favorably with those of the oldest and best publishing houses in America.

It will be admitted that the JOURNAL has, from its first number (which was universally pronounced good, both in substance and mechanical execution), been highly progressive. Its proprietor and editor has had an eye single to the rapidly unfolding philosophy of spirit communion, and has from week to week journalized the varied phenomena of spirit intercourse with mortals, be the same upon the physical or mental plane. That fact will be readily admitted by all honest readers.

Many new and startling facts have been presented in each succeeding number. We have spared no pains to crowd our columns to their utmost capacity, by setting our matter solid and in small clear type, thus affording all the newspaper reading matter desired by the great mass of subscribers.

We are assured by those who peruse our columns, from every section of country where the paper goes, that it is looked for with a degree of anxiety that is elicited by no other paper, and that if perchance a copy is lost, great disappointment is the result, until its place is supplied by another copy from this office.

These almost universal expressions of kindness and approval, inspire us from week to week to make renewed efforts to fill our columns with fresh inspirations, clear and distinctly expressed thoughts, from the multitude of self-constituted correspondents scattered broadcast through the land, as well as with the thoughts of those who belong to our departments and home editorial corps.

We can with full assurance of fulfillment, promise our readers that Volume XI. will reach them promptly on time from week to week,—each successive number richly laden with startling truths as they shall be developed from the supernal or mundane spheres. It will continue to be bold and iconoclastic in dealing with the popular superstitions of the religionists of the world.

It will chronicle new discoveries in the arts and sciences—never failing to proclaim a truth because it has not been recognized as such by the so-called scientists.

All rational minds must concede that wisdom is more fully developed in the supernal spheres than among the mortals of earth. To a limited extent that wisdom, through a diversity of media, is being transmitted to mortals. The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL will continue to promulgate the same, as received, to its many thousands of readers.

A department devoted to the Arts and Sciences will be reopened—carrying out the original design of the circle of spirits who inaugurated this institution.

This department will be under the management of Dr. Y. A. CARR, of Mobile, Alabama, a gentleman of high mental culture, who is well known to the literary and scientific world. He is a bold searcher for truths, and a faithful student of the Philosophy of Life—a Spiritualist of unwavering fidelity.

The JOURNAL will treat all subjects with candor, avoiding all unpleasant controversies upon subjects of no moment to the general reader; nevertheless, truth shall not suffer for want of an advocate from any fears on our part of giving offense to egotistical devotees of any fallacy, or the admirers of superficial, would-be leaders in Spiritualism, who would sacrifice all principles and cater to any prejudice, for the sake of the applause of such admirers.

In a word, it will continue to be the aim of the editors and proprietor to work in harmony with the angels who inaugurated this journal—to make it just what the thinkers of the present age demand, fearless of all consequences. Such a course is fully warranted from past experience.

While a small class of Spiritualists have from the dawn of Modern Spiritualism aimed to sectarianize this great system of philosophy—under protest against creeds it is true, but nevertheless in every movement tending to such an ultimate, the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL has boldly encountered the monstrous idea and been triumphantly sustained by the best thinkers as well as by the great mass of the receivers of the truths of spirit intercourse. Indeed, it was a cardinal idea with the spirits who inaugurated this institution and gave birth and name to our paper, to dispel the vision of a sect of religionists, and to unfold in its place the Philosophy of Life.

The world has from early morn been crushed down, and crippled mentally, by religion. Sect upon sect has been built up all over the world, producing suffering and misery in all ages, the thought of which curdles the blood in the veins of every sympathetic soul.

The world is sick—very sick—with religion! The antidote is common sense.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL boldly takes the field as the advocate of that despised, hated, and religiously rejected commodity.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

NUMBER LVII.

A God in the Debris of our Streets and offal of our Yards—His Presence in the Sting of a Bee and saliva of the Mad Dog—The Condition he is in in the Lower States of Matter—Can he Possess the Five Senses—There is a Principle in the Universe that takes Cognizance of all things—The Fount of all Knowledge, all can drink therefrom. (Concluding Articles.)

Many are anxiously waiting for a solution of this question, desiring to see whether we will present them with a principle, personality, or quality of the Universe, that they can regard as a God. Because we have denounced the orthodox Deity, we have been bitterly condemned by Bible Spiritualists; because we have failed to discover an intelligent, omnipresent principle permeating all departments of life, we have been signally rebuked by those who believe in the same; because we have declared that man stood at the apex of created things, the cry has arisen, impossible!—away with such atheistical notions,—such vile innovations, such a departure from old established ideas! On all sides we have had occasion to attack pet theories, to demolish them, and build in their place a fabric more in consonance and harmony with the destiny of man. Notwithstanding the opposition we have met, we have ventured boldly forward, discussing those points in connection with this question that concern the welfare of all. We may well pause and ask, why should humanity cling so tenaciously to the idea that there is a God, an infinite, intelligent Principle, permeating every nook and corner of the universe, that controls and guides all things? It would be well in this stage of the examination of the subject, to stop and inquire where is the dividing line between this God and the material of the universe. If a God, does he exist distinct from matter, or is he incorporated therewith? If omnipresent, he is certainly impregnated with all things; and possessing all-power, we can reasonably conclude that matter is a part and parcel of his organic structure. It can not be otherwise. He acts, you claim, through the instrumentality of the material world, the same as the spirit of man manifests its inherent power through the medium of the physical organization. This idea is an important one, as it has received the indorsement of many prominent Spiritualists, who are as fanatical on this idea or question, as the Puritan Fathers were in regard to a Devil, hence we should give it a careful and critical examination. If an intelligent principle, diffused in all things, we can conclude that any life manifested, is only the expression of that intelligent principle. In this theory we have intelligence permeating every particle of matter; it is in the tail of the snake, the trunk of an elephant, the horn of the ox, the hair of the buffalo, the skin of the alligator; in the tooth of the reptile, sting of the bee, poisonous saliva of the mad dog; in the debris of our streets, in the ulcer on your arm,—this intelligent principle is in all things,—is the guiding, controlling influence, and works in accordance with law.

If God has the intelligence of man without his senses, then he can neither smell, hear, taste, see, or feel. If you assign to him attributes common to humanity, be reasonable in your conclusions, and say that he has the five senses that accompany these attributes!

Having been created by this God, as is declared, we find that certain things in the material world are offensive to our senses, and that is universally so. Can we not reasonably conclude that they are offensive to God also? You place this intelligence in the debris of our streets, offal of our yards,—in all the putrid conditions of life—and if the five senses are exercised, in what condition does it place this God? If this principle is omnipresent, as you claim it is, and possesses the five senses, seeing, feeling, hearing, smelling, and tasting, it must suffer intensely. Now, if it can see, and hear, we can reasonably infer that it can taste, smell and feel. If it takes cognizance of all things, such must be the case. At a glance our readers can clearly perceive the curious relations in which this God would be placed. He is assigned intelligence—it is omnipresent. If he has one attribute of man, why not all? Would you not assign him the sense of feeling, and is not that as omnipresent as his intelligence? If he takes cognizance of all things, if he observes all things as you claim, he must not only see them, hear them, smell them, but feel all the sensations that man does! It can not be otherwise. You assign to him attributes and qualities common to all, and then declare, that with his senses fully awakened, he exists in the debris of our streets and the offal of our yards! If this God is in one condition of life, he is in all. He is in the putrid sore that licentiousness has caused to break out on your body; in the loathesome ulcer that some poisonous disease has caused. Possessing attributes common to each one, we don't admire his home. We prefer living outside of some of those conditions; prefer having our home in a quiet place where all is clean and fully adapted to our nature. But the objector will say, God is a principle,—omniscient, omnipotent, omnipresent. You assign him intelligence to observe and plan, why not senses to feel? Without them he could take no notice of the suffering of humanity.

Puny God! If you have the attributes of your children, you can work like them.

To say that he originated man, conceived him, developed him, brought him forth, and yet possesses none of his characteristics, is foolish in the extreme, but it is still more so to assign a home for God's intelligence in the debris and offal of our streets, when man could not live there a single moment.

What is the tendency of man's destiny? Why, to rise out of matter into more refined conditions of life. Yet you assign a God to the lowest form of matter, when his natural tendency would be to rise out of it—far above it, in the realms of spirit. Yes, the tendency of man's life is grandly upward! He leaves behind him crude matter—the scum and filth of earth, and with his soul grandly illuminated, ascends to the higher spheres. Would you confine a God to the lower strata of matter? Listen to the voice of reason; be consistent in your researches, and do not consign the Infinite to the offal of your streets and yards. He is not there. There is no God in the mouth of the rabid dog; no God in that poisonous ulcer on your limb; no God in that sting—he is not there! Banish that idea at once. Away with such a belief! The world to-day would be better off with correct conceptions of Deity. Don't diffuse or confine intelligence to the lower strata of matter, or declare that God is in yonder cess-pool! While you rise grandly above such conditions, try to escape them, you leave your God there to endure what you have always tried to avoid.

Look at that pale, feeble woman. How care-worn her features! What a solemn sadness illumines her countenance; and the tear glistens in her eyes. Her heart is a tomb of buried sorrows—a sepulchre where she has shut up the untold effects of all her misfortunes. As a wife and a mother she contends with a drunken husband; suffers unspeakable agonies. Calmly, with a soul racked with social storms, she kills herself and child. What a scene! God was there—in the shining dagger and in the lacerated wound; two parts of God met, and the result was, the death of the mother and child! God, being omnipotent, was in that dagger—sensed the pain of that woman and child! Here were two beings whom God had created. He was present—saw them meet a violent death—and possessing all power, was powerless to prevent the awful deed. But God can only work through the instrumentality of law, you will say. As that is all conjecture, would not the supposition be equally sound and logical, that man being his child, the father should be able to operate like him? As the tendency of the spirit of man is to rise forth from matter, and before it can rise from one sphere to another it is compelled to leave its coarse garb or outward dress behind, can we not reasonably conclude that if there is an intelligent God he is independent of matter in every respect? Which position will you assume, O suffering ones of earth? Can you believe, as you toil in poverty, that Omniscience and Omnipotence envelops you? If such were the case, would you not suppose that this Omniscience would have intelligence to conceive some method by which you might be relieved, and omnipotence have the power to execute the same?

Lucretus comes again and enters into conversation with our guide.

Lucretus.—I plainly comprehend the position you assume, but tell me, please, is there no principle in existence that takes cognizance of all things?

Spirit.—There is no principle in the universe that possesses the five senses that distinguish humanity. When you declare that God is omnipresent, or that he exists as an intelligent principle, he permeates every condition of life. You can separate him from nothing. He is in the loathsome sore as well as in the cheeks that bloom with health. The sense to feel as human beings do would induce constant suffering on his part. Think of it! How utterly absurd the thought that God is present in the sting of the bee or in the poisonous saliva of the mad dog. There he is with his omniscience and omnipotence, yet he cannot prevent their destructive influence. You teach man to avoid the lower strata of life,—its cess-pools, its debris and offal,—but foolishly say it is the home of your God, who is supposed to be much more refined than his children.

Lucretus.—In the operations constantly going on in the material world, we observe certain manifestations beyond our comprehension. We see action,—why not ascribe that to a God?

Spirit.—Admitting this intelligent principle called God as existing in every molecule of matter, does not man control it (God), when he directs it in any channel he desires? Is God in the air you breathe, the water you drink, and the food you eat? and does he permeate your physical system? Do you breathe God, eat him and drink him? If he is omnipresent, you certainly are constantly in contact with him, and he is sensible of all the changes through which you pass.

Lucretus.—Then, is there no intelligent principle in the universe?

Spirit.—Not in the sense in which humanity uses the term. You cannot diffuse a thought, and it still have an existence.

Lucretus.—But is there no principle in the universe that is omnipresent—that takes cognizance of all things?

Spirit—Ah! you have asked an important question: in due time it shall be fully answered, and in a manner that all can understand. There is an element in the material and spiritual realms that takes cognizance of all things—of every thought, wish, and deed; and I will fully explain to you in due time the philosophy of its action, and how the mind can come in rapport with the Fount of all knowledge. You fully understand the grandeur of man's destiny.

Lucretus.—But would not that be God?

Spirit.—How eager for a God! And you seem to catch at a straw like a drowning man. Your determination to have a God blinds your reasoning power, and you can but illy understand me.

Lucretus.—But what can the Fount of all Knowledge be if not God?

Spirit.—We will leave it to humanity to decide that question.

Lucretus.—Does it possess omnipotence also?

Spirit.—It possesses all power, but not, perhaps, in the sense in which the world uses the term.

Lucretus.—But you have repeatedly said that a God possessing the attributes of humanity was an impossibility!

Spirit.—We say so still.

Lucretus.—I am impatient. Please explain to me more fully.

Spirit.—I am conducting this Search. Had the writer had his choice, he would have closed it six months ago, and his intense anxiety to do so nearly destroyed my control of his organism. At the proper time full explanations will be given. The cry coming up from various quarters, that my views did not coincide exactly with those of certain Spiritual lecturers on the earth sphere, and that I was landing Spiritualists on the bleak shores of Atheism, only seems to me ludicrous. I only aim to inspire independence of thought, to inculcate a high standard of morality, and and arouse men to a true knowledge of their destiny. I shall point you to the Fount of all Knowledge, but millions of years may elapse before you can fully quench your thirst therefrom.

Mediumship in Chicago.

By reference to our Medium's Register, the names and place of residence of several well-vouched for mediums will be found.

MRS. MAUD LORD, since our last notice, has held several well attended seances, at the residence of people in different parts of Chicago.

THE BANGS CHILDREN will soon resume their seances. Since cooler weather has set in, the manifestations with these mediums are of increased power, and this new phase,—the lower sash of a window moves up and down without human aid. Questions are answered, yes, or no, by the raising and lowering of the sash—three motions of the sash being understood to mean yes, and one motion, no. Audible voices of spirits are also heard, so that brief conversations are held between spirits and mortals.

MR. ROSE, at 362 State street, is meeting with success in taking spirit photographs, but is not making that branch of photography a specialty yet. He has a gentleman associated with him, and the prospect is good for their soon becoming very good spirit artists. We were shown one that was taken late in the evening by lamp-light, no person nor object except the burning lamp was before the camera. The likeness of a very fine looking spirit was developed on the plate, almost as perfect as if taken from a person yet in the human form.

This was taken at the suggestion of a spirit, through another medium. The result was contrary to the expectations of the artist. Indeed he reluctantly tried the experiment, not believing any result would be obtained under the conditions suggested.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON, at 148 Fourth Avenue, continues to treat the most severe cases of acute and chronic diseases, of people living in all parts of the country, on receipt of a lock of their hair, with a certainty of cure that confounds old investigators in the field of spiritual science and philosophy.

There are a great number of other excellent healing mediums in Chicago, practicing with fine success, many of whose names will be found in the Medium's Register, and advertisements in this paper.

The place of residence of trance and test mediums, not only in Chicago but in many other places, will also be found in the Register.

Another Life of Christ.

Henry Ward Beecher, having nothing else to do, is engaged in writing a life of Christ. The reading world is already blessed with about 400 lives of this rather important personage, while, on the other hand, we have not more than half a score of lives of Satan, who, according to orthodoxy, is a much more important personage than Jesus Christ—that is, he succeeds in convincing about four times as many people of the truths of his doctrines.

Now, we earnestly protest against so much valuable time being spent in writing the life of a person about whom so much is already known, when there are other biographical fields in which distinction may be won. A German professor has estimated that there are about 444,000 devils, large and small. It may be because the Devil has divided himself into so many distinct parts that has deterred men from venturing to write his life. This should only be a greater incentive to eminent divines to give us an outline of his chief characteristics, his birth place, and especially, his age. As there are, so many of him they can give him a multitude of contradictory characteristics. As the ministers of the gospel are continually predicting what evils he is about to inflict upon mankind, etc., they are abundantly capable, by their own testimony, to give to the world an accurate biography of him. It may be his migratory disposition that has been a preventive to the wished-for work; yet we think if he were petitioned in an able manner that he would rest long enough to have his portrait taken, horns, hoofs, and all, especially when he foresaw what a vast amount of good (or evil) an accurate and truthful account of his life would do in the world. In a pecuniary point of view, it would be a grand success, as it would be eagerly sought after by the people generally. Priests and priestcraft would, however, find this a losing card to play, for were they to tell the people the truth in regard to all they know of the mysterious myth known as Satan, they would soon find their occupation gone, and their source of revenue destroyed.

The people are gradually emancipating themselves from the thraldom of old theology, and when they learn that this myth of Satan and a literal hell has been held over them by designing knaves, who are robbing the people of their honest earnings to support an aristocratic priesthood, there will be a mighty reaction. These pampered, kid-gloved gentry are hanging to the throats of the honest masses, and are playing the part of leeches—sucking their life-blood—meeting them at every turn of their reasoning powers with the Devil and his brimstone hell. Since they are so well informed in regard to the ways and doings of his High Mightiness, the great Lucifer, let us have a clear and concise history of him written, in order that the people may judge for themselves whether the reports they receive of him are true or not. The "blood of the Lamb" is at a discount; the other side of the story is wanted. Mr. Beecher might inaugurate the work by publishing a life of the Devil in connection with his forthcoming work on Christ, devoting four times as much space to the former as to the latter, as he gets four times as many of God's children, according to the orthodox showing, which makes him four times as powerful as God, Jesus Christ, and the "blood of the Lamb" combined.

Corporation Murders.

During the past three months the American people have been inflicted with a surfeit of horrors, each succeeding one seeming to be greater and more sickening in its details than the last. Gas accumulates in a coal mine, ignites and explodes, hurrying a hundred human beings to an awful death, leaving the stricken widows and orphans dependent upon the charities of the world. Through the criminal ignorance of an engineer, a boiler explodes on a ferry-boat, and strews the waters with the mangled bodies of two hundred dead and dying persons. Trains of cars rush into each other, burning and crushing the passengers. And on the 26th of August comes the terrible accident on the Eastern railroad, in Massachusetts, as a fitting crown to this list of horrors. The verdict of the sworn juries in all these cases has been to the one point, that they are due to the grasping avarice of the giant monopolies who controlled those railroads and ferry-boats. The president and superintendent of the company and the engineer of the Westfield have been indicted for manslaughter in the third degree. This is a step in the right direction; but will anything come of it?

The people of New York City at the present time seem to be paralyzed at the power of the monopolies, and it is almost impossible to receive justice when a moneyed individual or company is interested. Money has a potential power, and is used freely in buying up all who stand in the way of anything the company may have in view.

The time has arrived for an earnest protest from the people against this corruption which is festering in the high places. Let it be understood that unless all possible precautions are taken, when a butchery occurs, those who hold the high offices in the corporations—those whose duty it is to see to these things—will be indicted for murder, and let them have the same trial as any other criminal who wilfully deprives a human being of his life. The mangled forms of the many victims of the recent murders call loudly for a reformation in this matter.

Mrs. E. Armstrong Pray.

We are in the receipt of a long letter giving the experience of a lady who was brought up to revere the theological dogmas of the Episcopal Church, from which, through great trials, troubles, and tribulations, she has been emancipated, and now has an abiding faith in Spiritualism. The history of her experience would make an interesting pamphlet.

Whitehouse vs. Cheney.

These ecclesiastics, the one a bishop and the other a priest, have been at loggerheads for some time past. Mr. Cheney, refusing to use the word "regenerate" in the baptism of infants, was deposed in May last, by a council of priests presided over by Bishop Whitehouse; but Cheney refuses to "depose," and is sustained by his congregation. Bishop Whitehouse sent notice to the wardens of Christ Church, that on the 10th of September, he would make them an official visit, and would then confirm all who would be presented by a clergyman, also intimating in his notice that as Mr. Cheney was now deposed, and Christ Church was without a pastor, he would bring one with him. The wardens replied that they would be happy to see the Bishop, etc., but informed him that they had a pastor,—the Rev. Mr. Cheney.

So things have stood until the time arrived for the visit of Bishop Whitehouse. The Church was filled with a crowd of curious persons, who went to see what would come of the meeting of this modern Goliah and David. The Bishop was informed by the wardens, that if he performed the rite of confirmation, the persons would be presented by Mr. Cheney. The Bishop refused to confirm, and read a lengthy protest against the "force" used as "an obstruction to the fulfillment of his official duties." The "force" used was, that he was informed by the wardens, that they would in no manner oppose his officiating in connection with Mr. Cheney. The Bishop retired, a vanquished champion for the time being, and the applicants for confirmation are left for some time longer "in danger of hell-fire." Upon whose head shall the penalty fall if one of these precious souls is lost? Surely not upon Mr. Cheney, for he offered to present them, and the Bishop refused to receive them at his hands.

Charles E. Cheney stands to-day as a representative of the fact that men can no longer take upon themselves binding oaths, and expect the everchanging hand of time to let them remain intact. The man who subscribes his name to a creedal faith and set of articles, which he solemnly swears to live up to in all time, virtually denies and ignores the law of eternal progression. He admits by that act that he has in his own opinion, attained the ultimate of knowledge. Men are constantly changing,—ever growing wiser, and must, therefore, from necessity, change their views.

The wrong of Mr. Cheney consisted in subscribing his name in the first place to the articles of his church, but he has righted it manfully by throwing off the yoke now. We hope for the sake of freedom of thought, that he will be sustained by his church to the end in this matter, and that Bishop Whitehouse may learn that he is not Pope of Illinois.

Let all of those Spiritualists who favor a dogmatic creed, take warning from the above facts, and remember that one of the fundamental principles of Spiritualism is a recognition of the law of perpetual progression, and that no boundary or limit can be defined by one mind for another.

Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson.

This estimable lady and very efficient worker in the cause, has been lecturing to crowded houses in Des Moines, Iowa. Mrs. Wilcoxson, by her sterling integrity and the unflinching manner in which she has combatted the errors of theology, and sown the seeds of spiritual truth, has raised herself up, until to-day she stands in the foremost ranks of the world's reformers. Her articles as published in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, and the reports of her lectures, are always eagerly sought after, and the announcement of her intention to lecture anywhere, always draws out crowded houses, and we are happy to know of her continued success in Des Moines.

The friends at Topeka, Kansas, have succeeded in securing her services during the month of November. The result will be several serious breaks in the ranks of orthodoxy.

We append extracts from two daily papers published at Des Moines.

The lectures at Spiritual Hall last Sabbath were well attended, and elicited unusual commendation from those who heard them. Mrs. Wilcoxson lectures again to-day, as will be seen by notice elsewhere.—Daily Register.

Do not fail to hear Mrs. Wilcoxson at Spiritualist Hall on to morrow; she is a very forcible speaker, and handles her subject with pleasing and convincing ability.—Daily State Leader.

The Journal.

This number of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, as usual, is overflowing with good things for the spiritual body. On the first page will be found an interesting and accurate report of the investigation of three Fellows of the Royal Society of London, in the claims of Spiritualism; on the second page a very instructive lecture from Emma Hardinge, and interesting letters from correspondents; on the third page a copy of the correspondence in regard to the genuineness of the spirit pictures taken by Madison Doherty; on the fourth page a continuation of the "Search after God" and the usual editorials; on the fifth page will be found the department of Brother Child, giving a continuance of his interesting article, "Statuvolence," and also the new department by Dr. Carr, of Arts and Sciences; the sixth page contains interesting essays and "Voices from the People;" on the eighth page will be found an interesting article from Brother Wilson, in his department.

At the beginning of the volume is the time, friends, to renew your own subscriptions, and to induce your neighbors to subscribe. See our "Entirely New Proposition," to be found on the eighth [illegible], of Columbus, Texas, writing [illegible] of the 6th, says:

"In favor of the 29th ultimo is received; also Microscope No. 1655. I would rather give five dollars for this one than one for the first I ever received (the Craig). Please send me three dozen microscopic objects, so that I may have a variety."

Personal and Local.

—We are indebted to W. A. Gunney for favors received in the shape of interesting extracts. We are always glad to receive them from the friends as indicative of the interest they have in the JOURNAL.

—We are informed by D. T. Elwards, of Otter Creek, Mo., that the Spiritualists of that section are being favored with some very fine physical manifestations through the mediumship of Nathan W. Koons, of Ohio. In his presence spirits materialize hands, and write communications independent of the hand of the medium.

—Mrs. F. W. Calkins, the trance medium, will lecture Sunday, the 24th of September, in the town of Green Garden, in the Green Garden Court House, at ten o'clock. All are invited to attend.

—Elijah Woodworth writes as follows from Leslie, Michigan: "I saw in your issue of August 26th, that my challenge, as published in the issue of July 23rd, is accepted by C. Sprague, of Genesee, Ill., without any reserve as to items therein contained. All right. Please correct a typographical mistake. Where it says, 'Greek and Roman copies,' read—'Greek and Roman mythology.' He proposes to meet me anywhere on the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana Railroad, between Chicago and Lansing, Michigan. Can any suitable place be named for said debate, from Niles to Hillsdale,—if so, please inform me."

—Dumont C. Dake, M. D., has started on his fall campaign. See notice of his appointments in another column and when convenient, call on him. You will meet a perfect gentleman and successful physician with powerful clairvoyant and healing powers.

—The works of Lois Walsbrooker, viz, Alice Vale and Helen Harlow's Vow, are books of great merit under the veil of romance. Mrs Walsbrooker deals with some of the most vital questions that engage the attention of society, and does her work well.

—Mrs. A. B. Hall, what is your post office address? We can not credit you with the two dollars you sent until we know.

—Brother D. A. Eddy, of Cleveland, has our thanks for favors.

—Dr. Abba Lord Palmer, of New Boston, Ill., is having a fine run of business. See advertisement in another column.

—Brother R. F. Truesdale, of Carlisle, gave us a call this week. He informs us that he has a fine hall that he should be pleased to have used by any of our lecturers who may visit that section.

—Addie L. Ballou, having just closed a very successful engagement of three months at Terre Haute, Ind., will receive calls to lecture through Indiana, Illinois and adjoining states during September, October and November, and in the South during the winter months. Societies desiring her services should be prompt in securing them, as she wishes to arrange her engagements at as early a date as possible. Address in care of this office.

—If you want employment for yourself or children, read the advertisement of "Agents wanted." Messrs. E. C. Wooley & Co., offer superior inducements.

—We are sorry to inform our readers that P. B. Jones, a photograph artist of Davenport, Iowa, has had the misfortune to lose his house by fire. He is a prominent Spiritualist, and we hope the friends in Iowa will give him such assistance as the circumstances demand.

—Mr. O. P. Kellogg is speaking at Clyde, Ohio, and will attend the grove meeting at Monroe, Ashtabula County, Ohio, on September 23 and 26. Societies wishing to engage him for the winter months can do so by addressing him at East Trumbull, Ashtabula Co., Ohio.

—Dr. J. H. Hill writes as follows in reference to Dr. Abba Lord Palmer. "I can freely recommend her to all who are anxious for knowledge and reliable evidence pertaining to an investigation of the beautiful philosophy of spirit communion. I do not know that we were ever hearer each other than two or three hundred miles, and also entire strangers previous to sending her my request for an investigation, which was responded to with a critical and searching examination of my peculiar surroundings and circumstances, including an analysis of my social and domestic relations which was truthful and reliable; also information which I consider very valuable."

—Charles H. Read, the physical medium, is at present at St. Paul, Minn., where he is creating quite a stir among the ranks of skeptics. He expects to return to Chicago in the course of a month. He has our thanks for a list of subscribers.

—Read the advertisement of the Radical, to be found in another column. All the radical questions of the day are discussed in its columns in a way that is enjoyable to all liberal sts. Send thirty cents for a specimen copy to 25 Bromfield street, Boston, Mass.

—A considerate and superstitious burglar in New Orleans returned a wedding ring he had stolen with an anonymous note explaining that "it would bring calamity if he took it away."

—At the late West-German chess players' convention, held at Crefeld, Wilfried Paulsen played simultaneously six so-called blindfold games, that is, without looking on the boards. He won five games and the sixth was drawn. The playing lasted from five to ten o'clock, P. M.

—BETHANY, MO.—A few weeks since we published a notice of a meeting to be held at Bethany, Mo., on the 29th inst. We have since received information that the meeting has been indefinitely postponed on account of an inability to procure good speakers at present, as a consequence of the illness of the leading ones in the movement.

—Another appalling calamity has visited the island of St. Thomas. By a devastating hurricane, simultaneously accompanied by several earthquake shocks, on the afternoon of the 21st inst., almost all the houses on the island were prostrated, causing the death of nearly one hundred and fifty persons, and making a large proportion of its entire population homeless and destitute.

—Mrs. S. A. Jesmer, writing from Bridgewater, Vt. says: "I am a medium for communications, psychometrist and speaker. I attended the quarterly convention at Stowe, Vt., June 23, lasting four days. We visited Mt. Mansfield, which was well worth the journey, so sublime was the prospect. We had one continual feast from the great storehouse of mind from the angelic spheres. Brother Carpenter, and Dr. N. B. Storer of Boston, and Lewis Manchester, of Randolph, Vt. A musical medium, A. E. Stebbey, of Leicester, Vt., delivered a written lecture, given by inspiration, a most soul thrilling production, full of deep, heart-felt truths. Since my return I have been placed in the crucible of pain and suffering, and am myself a poor widow, not knowing that I shall be able soon to work for a starving multitude, and seeing you are generous enough to furnish your excellent paper free to-widows, I appeal to you to send it to me. Please say that I will give delineations of character or disease, by lock of hair or picture, on receipt of two dollars."

Statuvolence.

[NUMBER V.]

HEALING MEDICUMSHIP.

This, like every other branch of this highly important subject, has been involved in a great deal of mystery, and buried beneath the fogs of ignorance and superstition.

Healing by the laying-on of hands is undoubtedly the oldest method of cure, having been practiced ever since the origin of the race. It is natural for a person to place the hand upon any part of the body where there is pain, and from the habit of doing this ourselves we come naturally to desire others to do it. Here, as much as in any other department of Nature is the law of "natural selection" beautifully manifested, for from the earliest infancy and all through life there are attractions and repulsions in regard to this subject of relieving pain and healing diseases, which are innate and not dependent upon the mind or will.

Whatever a universal custom has existed among mankind, there must be a basis of truth in it, however much of error may have gathered around it.

Looking at man clairvoyantly, we see, as Swedenborg declared, that the real man is spiritual, and these physical bodies are but the external temples built up by these for their use in the material surroundings of time. Disease exists, either in these bodies, or in the connecting influence by which the soul acts upon them.

In order to comprehend the true process of healing, we must know all we can of the body and its relations to the spirit, which connects the life in the different parts, and thus retains it, as a whole, in the body.

These physical bodies are subject to organic laws and each organ, though of necessity a member of the commonwealth which constitutes the man, has certain specific and independent powers of development within itself and upon the integrity of the different organs, in part, at least, will depend the continuance of the presiding genius of life, the soul, which acts through the mental organism.

The tendency of each organ is toward its own strength and health,—the development of itself by its internal forces and the accretion of good materials adapted to it, in this there is a continual contest with forces around it, and when the will of the soul is withdrawn for any considerable time, the latter overcomes the former, and dissolution ensues. The laws of life require that for a time all the organs shall submit to the will, which constitutes to the soul, but in all living beings there is a necessity for that repose which we call sleep, in which the action of the will is suspended more or less perfectly, the soul looking for the time left free to roam where its attractions may lead.

During this absence of the presiding genius of life, the voluntary organic functions are passive, and the organs themselves naturally tend toward equilibrium and recuperation, hence sleep is universally recognized as "tired Nature's sweet restorer." This is not true, however, of all forms of sleep. The amount of sleep required, varies in different individuals and under different circumstances, and this is much influenced by habit.

Each organ in health generates more life force within itself than it requires, and some of this may be transmitted to others, and this constitutes the law of healing by the laying-on of hands.

Certain persons have the power of healing certain diseases; some the throat and others the eyes; some the liver and others he lungs. We know of healers thus gifted with these special powers.

Every healthy person generates more vitality than they require, and from almost every organ there will be given off something, and hence all are more or less gifted with this power of healing, and when they understand their powers, may do a vast amount of good and be blessed in return; for all moderate and reasonable efforts in this direction are beneficial to the giver as well as the receiver.

There is, however, a degree of uncertainty in the application of the healing powers. There must be a congeniality, an affinity between the parties, or there can not be any great good accomplished. Statuvolence as taught by Dr. Fahnestock, there are great advantages. The soul becomes more perfectly separated from the body, but still holds its connection with it, and is enabled to perceive the parts of the system where there is a deficiency in the vital forces, and by an effort of the will directed toward these points can very often relieve them. And when by a properly directed effort of the will this portion of the body will continue to receive its full supply, and thus is that equilibrium which constitutes health, beautifully and permanently restored.

The first act of the will is to relieve the pain by cutting off the connection through the nerves of sensation, of the part affected with the brain. When a person enters more deeply into the statuvolic condition, they not only perceive these weak points, and have the power to aid them from their own resources, but they know how to draw from others that which shall aid them.

The statuvolent is very sensitive, not only to these weak points, but to the influences of those around them; they also feel that every person affects them, either pleasantly or otherwise, and are ever able to judge correctly in regard to these.

The pain of resisting pain, and of passing through severe and painful operations without feeling any pain is not the only advantage resulting from the proper culture of statuvolence, which, more than anything else enables persons to develop their physical powers better than any other plan that has been discovered. It enables them to prevent many diseases from taking hold of the system by the proper act of the will. This is the secret of the power which physicians and nurses have of escaping diseases which they are obliged to attend. The consciousness of well done,—the absence of fear, and the feeling that we will not have the disease, are the best protection, and thus, with reasonable care physicians generally escape.

Statuvolence, when properly exercised, will enable persons to remove many diseases, and alleviate others by directing the will in the proper channel. We consider intelligent, practical and well directed statuvolence to be one of the greatest blessings that can be acquired by any human being, and we recommend it to all who are desirous to have the highest enjoyments in this life, and know the most that mortals can learn of the life beyond.

We have written these articles for the purpose of explaining this subject, and in the hope of awakening a deeper interest in it. We see our fellow men treating each other in many cases almost exclusively on the physical plane, and others partially on the mental plane, and rarely do they meet soul-wise. Spirits have come to introduce us to each other, to teach the great lesson that to know ourselves we must know our fellow beings, not merely from external observation, but deeply, truly and interiorly. That the great end and aim of life for man to know himself, can only be reached through this, which, if properly pursued is a most pleasant and interesting path.

The sword must slowly fade as the world advances, lifting the qualities of peace into the place of honor once held by the qualities of war. A corroding more resplendent than the sword has ever known awaits the pen when it shall have become the pure channel of inspiration and sympathy, teacher of truth, redemption of ignorance, and illumination of the world.—Ager.

No one can ever rise above the level of the pen. We can not imagine Jesus Christ handling a sword, but we read that that divine person stooped and wrote on the ground.—Ibid.

The last sword will be broken by the fall of a pen upon it. But the last pen will be seen only when the last man is about to disappear.—Ibid.

Nothing can save the pulpit from becoming neglected and obsolete, except the throwing of it open to the whole light of modern knowledge, criticism and culture; the wise and generous improvement of it by the occasion for the illustration and distribution of the treasures of science, literature and art in all their relations with the inner life of man.—Ibid.

Arts and Sciences.

BY.....DR. Y. A. CARR.

Our new Department Devoted to the Arts and Sciences.

It affords us great pleasure to announce, with the beginning of this Volume, that we open a special Department in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, to be devoted to the Arts and Sciences, edited by Y. A. Carr, M. D., of Mobile, Alabama,—a gentleman of known ability and research and well-known throughout the South and South-west as a scientist, journalist, and author of over twenty years experience. As such we commend him to the most respectful consideration of our readers, hoping to derive from this important department the most beneficial results.—[ED. JOURNAL.

IN RESPONSE, I would respectfully say to the friends of progress I feel thankful for this favoring opportunity to confer with them weekly on the all-important science of Chemistry and other kindred subjects, hoping for the best possible results, and sincerely pledging, as I do, my best ability and effort to this desirable end.

Respectfully,
Y. A. CARR, M. D.

Chemistry—Risk of Innovative views—Popular Assumes of Chemistry and Orthodoxy—Importance of Chemical Research—Relations of Knowledge to Science, Progressive Knowledge—Past and Future Heritage of Scientific Research—Fundamental Truths and Co-relations Facts—Germinal Starting Point and growth of Knowledge Observation, Prototypical Conception, Comparison, Synthesis, Analysis, Abstraction, Generalization, Classification, Induction, Deduction, Demonstration, Hypothesis, Theory, and Empiricism—The Duality of Matter and Force—Davy's "Electrical Theory"—Experiments in that direction—Dissolution of an Amorphous Conglomerate of Elements under Battery Action—Valuable Record of Results—Detailed list ranging as successively given off from 1 to 56—Advantages of committing to Memory the Elements in their number, order, etc.

Though fully realizing the fearful risk of offering such innovative views as are called for, by the rapid advancement of the human understanding, I nevertheless feel encouraged, by a deep sense of duty, to say that chemical science in its popular assume, sustains much the same relation to the actual rationale of natural law, as that of the popular assume of Orthodoxy, sustains to the actual rationale of natural religion.

I esteem chemists and believe them, (however unillumed by intuitive research) to be the truest, highest, and purest laborers for human good, and am incapable of showing any disrespect toward any whom I may be called, by a true sense of duty, to differ with in opinion.

So rapid and festive are the present changes of chemical research that text-work upon text-work follows in quick succession, rewritten and rellustrated, to meet the demands of discovery, achievement, circumstance, time and occasion; and not unfrequently to afford lounging room from some favorite theoretical hobby. It is all well, there is room enough for all, and the more thought on the theme the better for the present progressive welfare of all. All knowledge is science, science, however, differs from general knowledge, in so far, as it specifically applies to a classification of general facts on special subjects.

PROGRESSIVE knowledge of any science, advances direct to the analytic study and effort, to comprehend the interior nature and character of things, and has thus worked for us, as the heirs of the past, teaching us by profitable precept and example to work in turn, for such heirs as may succeed to the heritage of our labors. The humblest germinal pebble of science, cast into the great ocean of mind, sends forth wavelet after wavelet, from centre to circumference; yet so infinitely beautiful, that no one wavelet, nor science, interferes with another; but all go to make up the grand sum total of infinite knowledge. Human knowledge, being finite however, can only approach the infinite, through the self-attesting appreciation of itself, as well as all the surrounding centralizations, and circumferent laws of its correlational being. Could we comprehend the forces of centralized truth, as well as correlational facts, we could as easily tell, when certain revolutions would produce certain results afar off in the future, as we by understanding certain facts, can foretell the coming of a comet, or an eclipse of the sun. Suffice it, scientific-attestations, are the progressive stepping stones, by which aspiring humanity, may mount onward and upward in the utilitarian pathway of God, like self-comprehension, purity and perfection. Advancing from the simplest experimental test, we are permitted to reach a high degree of prevision educationally, but reach a still higher and more practical one, where the rational and intuitional realms of attestation blend in one. The knowledge germs, however small and uncultured, if properly sown and cultured, necessarily spring up and mature with the life of all individualized measures of purpose. Observation succeeds,—experiment follows,—conception by prototype results,—comparison of diversified objects, conditions and relations come next,—attended by the products of synthesis, analysis, abstraction, generalization, classification, induction, deduction and demonstration, or else, the grosser and more voluminous offerings of hypothesis, theory and empiricism.

To proceed, matter occupies space. Force is the inherent or unseen power or soul of matter—regulating it—presuming upon the reader's general knowledge of the indivisible, impenetrable, indestructible, and inert peculiarities of matter, as taught in the common philosophies of the day. I quote Prof. Youmans, a standard and worthy author, on the subject of Matter and Force, that I may the more aptly advance through him to a point far beyond that at which he stops. On page 28 he says:

"That which moves matter, or produces change, is called power or force. The causes of the foregoing changes are called the forces of nature. Thus the force of gravity draws a piece of iron to the earth; cohesive force holds its particles together; mechanical force shapes it; heat forces melts it; and chemical force rests or dissolves it. Matter and force are inseparable. We know nothing of force except through matter, and nothing of matter except through its forces."

Though unusual and innovative, this is well and wisely said. If we except the Electrical Theory suggestions made by Sir Humphrey Davy, at the time of his wonderful discovery of the electro-positive alkalies, Potassium, Sodium, Calcium, Strontium, and Barium, about sixty-four years ago, since which time we find but little else said about it.

Like other teachers of chemistry who run in the convenient groves of their fashionable text works, I, too, had omitted giving the consideration due the subject and eminent source from which the suggestions emanated until circumstantially called upon to do so.

In the year 1850 or '51,—perhaps '52.—I was asked by a medical student in a school in which I held a professorship, why chemical affinity, if an abstraction, or chemical force within itself, did not act in in-door nature as in out-door nature. "You," continued he, "teach us in your 'Synoptical Review of the Elementary Principles of Physiology,' and in your yesterday evening's lecture, and the books also teach us, that chemical affinity is of itself a force. If so, I repeat the question (with no idle curiosity), 'Why does it not operate in in-door as it does in out-door nature?' For instance, the elementary constituents floating uncombined in the arterial circulation, would in out-door nature, so to speak, combine, forming a wonderful variety, of acids and alkaline salts, while in the arterial circulation they show no affinities whatever?"

Though unable to answer the query correctly, and though I had mastered it by calling it a suspension, by the supervision of a vital force, in physiology, I could not so treat it in chemistry, especially where it (chemical affinity) was suspended, as in the case of passing an acid through an alkali, under the chemical suspending supervision of a powerful galvanic current, such as those by which Sir Humphrey Davy discovered the extreme electro-positive alkaline elements before mentioned.

Confessing my inability to answer this question satisfactorily, and finding nothing in the books to enlighten me in point, I resolved after some reflection and encouraging suggestions, to turn to Sir Humphrey Davy's wondrous Battery Talisman, for such light on the subject as might be obtained from that source.

Having had an immense, self-sustaining Daniels battery constructed, to the supervising of affinity-suspending circuit of which I subjected a heterogeneous compound of all grades of elementary condition, salts, acids, etc., etc., from the all-powerful supervision of which the following electro-negative elements were given off, as their respective affinities were successively suspended. I give the result, from memory, which is correct enough to show the dual life of elementary matter is the source of all motion, from the humblest to the most exalted range of "unity in diversity," whether physical or metaphysical.

But to proceed. The battery result gave off as follows, the first being electro-negative, and extending on in polar gradation to the positive polar extreme,—1 to 56.

Electro Negatives—the first given off by the affinity suspending galvanic or magnetic circuit.	Electro Positives—the last given off by the affinity suspending galvanic or magnetic circuit.	Neutral Salt, compounds of the electro-negative and positive elements.
1 Oxygen.	56 Potassium.	Potash.
2 Fluorine.	55 Sodium.	Floride of Sodium.
3 Chlorine.	54 Calcium.	Chloride of Calcium.
4 Bromine.	53 Glucinum.	Bromide of Glucinum.
5 Iodine.	52 Magnesium.	Iodide of Magnesium.
6 Sulphur.	51 Lithium.	Sulphate of Lithium.
7 Selenium.	50 Strontium.	Selenide of S rontium.
8 Tellurium.	49 Barium.	Telluride of Barium.
9 Nitrogen.	48 Yttrium.	Nitrate of Yttrium.
10 Phosphorus.	47 Thorium.	Phosphate of Thorium.
11 Arsenic.	46 Osmium.	Ars iate of Osmium.
12 Antimony.	45 Palladium.	Antimonides of Palladium
13 Silicon.	44 Cerium.	Silicate of Cerium.
14 Boron.	43 Zirconium.	Borate of Zirc nium.
15 Columbium.	42 Lanthanum.	[From this point the salts become less intense in their affinities, and finally merge into the mere oxyds of the metals]
16 Tungsten.	41 Terbium.
17 Molybdenum.	40 Aluminum.
18 Titanium.	39 Zinc.
19 Manganese.	38 Hydrogen
20 Platinium.	37 Carbon.
21 Uranium.	36 Cadmium.
22 Rhodium.	35 Rubidium.
23 Iridium.	34 Cobalt.
24 Vanadium.	33 Nickel.
25 Gold.	32 Iron.
26 Silver.	31 Mercury.
27 Copper.	30 Bismuth.
28 Lead.	29 Tin.

The elements numbered 7, 8, 15, 16, 17, 18, 53, 48, 44, 37, 46, 44, 43, 42, 41, 40, 35, are comparatively scarce and unimportant. The new elements, Didymium, Erbium, Niobium, Norium, Ruthenium, Tantalum, Thallium, Thorinum, and Indium, have been discovered since my analysis was made.

By way of encouragement, to all liberal thinkers I would most respectfully suggest that by committing this elementary list to memory, in rotation, numbers and all, they will not only be enabled, to master more at once than by a year's study otherwise applied, but actually to place every mind—stamped and equipped, as it were, with scientific senses—in the very heart of nature, to observe, analyze, and compare for itself, and furthermore, to make direct advances upon the true and tenable Spiritual grounds, around which such a wondrous human interest is now skirmishing, under so many seemingly insurmountable disadvantages.

By committing the key to memory, as suggested, and familiarizing your minds with the practical, yet ever changing and instructive facts in the premises, you will not only be able, by referring to your text work, to keep pace with the pioneering spirit of this department of the JOURNAL, but far in advance of others who may prefer wasting more time and means in securing the unavailable opinions of others, than would be necessary to prepare their own minds to understand, realize, and enjoy these wonderful researches and attendant reflections, as the soothings of a kind mother's impressive teachings.

Many of us know there is such a thing as mental relationship between the spheres, and it is the province of chemistry to prove it to every patient, open, or receptive mind. To do this, we must advance from matter to the soul of matter, which will explain itself where we find polar condition the source of motion in matter, which will be the subject of my next article.

Letter from William Johnston, a Bible Spiritualist—"The Search after God."

I like the JOURNAL very much, on account of its showings of spiritual life, but its theology seems to me unsound.

We had thought that ere this Mr. Francis would have vindicated his position, and found God. We must admit that it is the duty of honest men, whose only aim is to know the truth, to try his doctrines, and especially those denying the existence of an Infinite God. The theory which fears examination is not calculated to gain confidence. We are commanded to try the spirits, and the honesty of truth will not refuse or deny us the opportunity of trying the doctrines of that spirit to whose teachings Mr. Francis seems to be a willing convert. It would, therefore, raise our confidence in the cause of Spiritualism, and redound much to the credit of the philosophy of your journal should the following appear in its columns.

In yours of the 8th of July it is said: "If God uses himself in the construction of human beings, the part of himself incorporated in matter must be the part that can progress in knowledge, and how would it look—a part of God progressing,—God lying in a cradle, enveloped in matter and playing with toys!"

Until it can be shown that the conditions of spirit incarcerated in the flesh are the same as those out of the flesh, the soundness of Mr. Francis' view of God playing with toys cannot appear. Besides it has never been shown that the wisdom and power of angels or spirits has been exercised by human ratiocination and not by spiritual instinct. We know that spirits, being deprived of the organs of natural sense, cannot by its means exercise their spiritual powers, and therefore in the infant instincts of the child, we see the workings of a latent, instinctive power. Hence, before a finite spirit can exercise its powers by means of organized sense, these organs must be trained to give expression to the motions of the spirit that acts upon them, and therefore the process of training, as involving progression, is no proof whatever that the spirit given to man does not, as a finite being, relatively partake of the nature of the Infinite.

But in what does progression consist? Does it add to the mind new faculties and powers which were not inherent in it, or does it only serve to develop the abilities and powers originally given to the mind? Seeing that accordingly the latter. What, therefore, does progression do for us more than to open those avenues through which the latent and inborn powers of the mind come into action, and by which, God-like, it can gratulate in its native elements? Progression! What is it but the development of what was within the seed? What is it but the expansion of those qualities and powers given to man, and contained within the angel spirit of the infant, who, angel-like, sees as much beauty in a toy as in all the glory after which the older fools of the world aspire? The fact, therefore, that in the spirit given to humanity there are capabilities so infinite that only the schooling of eternity can bring them into action, proves in itself that he who gave it is the Infinite God and Father of spirits.

Now, it is asked "how a being perfectly organized, as God is claimed to be, can use himself without destroying his perfection?" Here we ask, where is the authority which claims that the God of the Bible is a "perfectly organized being?" Who will give us the analysis of the organs with which God is "perfectly organized?"

In this it appears that Mr. Francis labors under a very false idea of the God of Christianity. An organized God is not the God who is a spirit without body or parts of a material nature. Is it possible that the spiritual teacher of Mr. Francis supposes God to be a material substance? If not, how can a purely spiritual substance, subtile, quick, and all-penetrating, be the subject of organization? Such philosophy needs explanation before any postulate can be assumed from it.

How a spirit by using itself destroys its perfection is equally mysterious. If God be infinite, he must have in the infinitude of his wisdom and nature, clear and correct ideas of all things, and how the projection of those ideas into forms destroys his perfection, we are at a loss to know. Humanity conceives and projects, but does that in the least destroy its perfection? And how the God of humanity can be constitutionally disturbed by his act of creation, we wish to know. If in the mind of God, as a spirit in whose infinite comprehension all things are comprehended, how is the perfection of his being destroyed or his substance made less, by giving existence to the things contained in the capacities of his own being?

If, in the laws of creation, the fruit, branches, and other qualities of the creation has existed in the seed, how is the essence of the seed destroyed, or its capacities reduced by its giving existence to the fruit, and the branches, and other qualities of the tree? And is this production of the seed anything other than the development of the seed? And should we view our God as the seed from which universe has sprung, would his essence as a spirit, be diminished or the perfections of his substance destroyed by its being realized, and its qualities expressed in the works of his creation? I think not; and therefore fear the teachings of that "Search after God," whose existence is thus demonstrated, are not safe.

Again, he says: "An Infinite God fills all space." What! do spirits fill all space? Is the substance of God as a spirit the same as that of matter? Solid matter, we know fills space, but the properties of matter are not those of spirit, and why Mr. Francis should thus confound the one with the other as an argument against the existence of a God we cannot see. Confounding the properties of spirit with those of matter looks very like the work of materialism; so also does his idea of an organized God. The substance of the sun is of a material nature; the substance of the spirit is not; and yet it will be difficult to show that the light or heat of the sun occupy visible space, and how much more difficult to show that a subtile, all-penetrating spirit requires all space, or fills any space whatever. A spirit thinks in me, but the space it uses to do so has never been ascertained; hence, the use of such philosophy to do away with the Infinite does not look sound.

Again, he writes: "If God exists, he is complete in himself; if he is manifested in man, he is not complete in himself." In this he forgets that he is dealing with an Infinite God. He forgets that in this infinity all his works are included.

"An infi[illegible]in all. In him we live and [illegible] our being." But although all [illegible]sion subsists and is upheld by God should not therefore suppose that such creation is a part of God, or that the substance of material creation is the same as that of the substance of the God who is a spirit.

Man makes machinery but although every part thereof is comprehended and originated in the mind of man, yet it will not do to suppose that this machinery is a part of the man or of the substance of his person. Nor will it do to suppose that man becomes incomplete in himself because that a part of himself has gone into the machinery, and that thereby his personal substance is wasted, and yet the whole and the parts of the machinery are contained in the mind of man. It is not, therefore, logical to argue because the mind of man is manifested in the machinery that therefore he has lost his completeness within himself.

Again, he asks: "If God imparts anything to man, is not that waste, so far as God is concerned? Is he the same after he imparts some of his strength to us? If he is constantly manifesting in each one, he is constant'y changing."

Allowing the idea of the materialist, that an infinite spirit is a material substance instead of a spiritual, the division of the substance cannot be construed into a waste of the substance. It is only the manifestation of the eternity and its powers; the substance of the parts would be the substance of the whole; and so where is the waste? Suppose infinitude were divided ad infinitum what would result but infinitude still? The substance of the whole still remains the same, intact and without change. For a change of the condition is not a change of the substance of the subject of the condition. The substance of the universe is one and the same substance, while the variety of conditions and modifications of the same substance are diverse and manifold.

But again, we advert to the unity of the substance of infinite mind, and in that unity we are obliged to include all the parts with their various forms and conditions, and in the idea that we only have to do with spirit and matter, of which all things are constituted and formed, and that the matter of the universe as one body stands in the same relation to the spirit of God as that in which the body of flesh and its relation to the spirit that dwells in it, we cannot scientifically separate the body, nor can we find a difference in the substance of the parts. In the idea, therefore, of the unity of the spirit, and the unity of matter as the body of the spirit, we find no place for the assumption that the spirit wasted itself by its diffusion through the body or its parts. And, relatively to this unity, my spirit has been acting upon, and vitalizing every part of my body for many years, and in it and by it the business of my life has been projected and controlled, and yet who will show me any waste or change of its laws, substance, or qualities? Nor does the diversity of its operations imply any change, variation, or waste of its substance. On the contrary, action, motion, and activity are the very laws of its being; and deny to the spirit the diversity of the modes of its action, and the diversity of the objects in which it acts and we deny the possibility of its existence. Nor would infinite mind make his infinite wisdom manifest without a relatively infinite variety of operations and of objects in which to make it manifest.

But, he asks, can you divide the conscious element of God? If an infinite spirit of the body of creation, how in the laws of science and unity, can the spirit or the body be divided? We have only two kinds of substance, namely: those of spirit and matter, and we see no law to authorize the assumption that the whole and the parts of any one body are not one in substance. And in obedience to this law of unity, the elements of matter, although different in their chemical species yet this difference is such as promotes a mutual coherence of the whole; so that, in the working of natural laws we get no right to sunder the parts from the whole. In every species of being, the laws of unity are made manifest. Can we divide the virtue of the seed or the sap of the tooth from that of the branches? Will it do to take the branch from its place in the tree? Can any member of the body live if he separate himself from his portion of the pressure of the atmosphere, whose relation to natural bodies is similar to that of the spirit to spiritual bodies? Or can any one exempt himself from the light and heat of the sun? Can we sever the air we breathe from its connection with the atmosphere as its source? Separate from continued connection with the sun our parts of its light and heat, and live independently of its influence, and then you can divide the conscious element of God," and separate your conscious element from his.

But a God not visible to the "five senses" is not the God of friend Francis, and with these senses he never can find other than a natural and physical God; for the God of spirit cannot be known but by spiritual sense. Only that God limited to the compass of natural sense will please Mr. Francis. Well, let us take him on his own ground, and say: "Is it not more reasonable to suppose that all things are under the control of real, tangible, living entities, whom we know exist, than a God that the five senses have failed to recognize?"

Real, tangible, living entities can only be found in tangible or material substance; for we know not that purely spiritual substance can be handled by the natural five senses."

"That God made this earth—that worlds and systems of worlds are created by him is all he guess work."

So he says. Now, it is a maxim of science that the cause must be equal to the effect. The phenomena of all the varied forms of creation, including all its laws, motions, qualities, mutual adaptations and operations, as the effect, is in itself infinite beyond the ken of the finite mind. The finite, therefore, as the cause, could not produce it as the effect; there must be, therefore, an infinite mind. Moreover, the earth was prepared for man before he had an existence. We, therefore, hope Brother Francis will tell us how man could give form to void matter before he had an existence. If man had no conscious being before this earth was created, how could he create it? and if he could not, who did? If he existed in germ form before he was created, who gave existence to that germ form? what was its origin? did blind nature or chance tell it to be?

Matter of itself is inert, and incapable of giving to itself those qualities and powers which we call the laws of nature; what, then, was the intelligence, and by what power was nature made? who gave her, when created, those laws and functions by which she performs so faithfully her wondrous work?

Hoping that the charity, candor and liberal spirit of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL is such as will allow the all-important question, whether or not there be a God, to be freely discussed in its columns, and that to this end the above suggestions will find a place therein, I am

PRAYER.

By Mrs. E. S. Kelso.

What is prayer? Worcester says, it is a petition, or supplication to God. It may also mean, an entreaty, or a petition to man, such as the people may offer to their legislators, or subjects to their king. But in this article we wish to treat of that form only, which consists in supplications to God, or, rather, to the Gods. Prayers are addressed to different Gods. Some nations pray to Gods of wood; others to Gods of stone. Some to the God of fashion to send them new dresses or new bonnets. Others to the God mammon to send them more gold. Others still to the God of battles to give them victory, and enable them to butcher thousands of their fellow beings; others yet, to the God of fame to send them laurels of renown. All denominations of the orthodox Christians have created Gods in their own likeness and image, to whom they offer numerous long prayers. From the time of Moses down to the present day, these Gods may be traced by the sword, and by blood, and they are, to a considerable extent on the blood-thirsty style now, yet they seem to be of a more aristocratic caste at present, so much so, that they must be worshipped only in costly churches and by fashionably dressed congregations. They also wish to rob the people of their freedom by getting themselves into the Constitution of the United States as they have into the constitutions and laws of many other nations. Priests and clergymen erect costly edifices in which to pray to their fashionable Gods, and when clad in the grand and solemn robes of godliness, they, with the pomp and vanity, known only to a peculiar people, offer their devotions up, where they suppose their Gods are. How can a woman, bearing upon her person such unmistakable evidences of weakness and bondage, and clad in the paraphanalia of the demi monde, kneel down and pray with a pure heart and an earnest devotion to a God of love and truth? It cannot be! They cannot forget their purple and fine linen, so dear to their hearts, for a sufficient length of time to offer a prayer, unless it should be, to murmur something about such elegant silks at Mr. Alexander's, or such a love of a bonnet at Mrs. Smith's.

It is exceedingly astonishing, when we reflect to what extent priest and clergymen are reverenced. They are men of God! His mouthpiece, and in some instances they rely almost entirely upon the Lord putting words into their mouths, and, consequently, they make a very poor preach of it; as poor, in fact, as did a certain long eared preacher of the same class in Balaam's time. The very atmosphere which surrounds them, their costly robes, fine canes, and kid gloves, say plainly enough, Stand aside, this is a man of God! So he folds his mantle of sanctity about him, to cover up his deeds of goodness, but, alas! too often, to hide from the world his blackness of heart, and deeds of crime! And, when on the Sabbath, he enters the house of God, and walks solemnly up the aisle, ascends into the pulpit, and kneels to pray, a great silence falls upon the congregation, and it is easy to see that they reverence the man, because he is a minister of the gospel. These Christians have different styles of praying. Some pray standing, others kneeling. A few pray in secret, but many love to pray standing on the corners of the streets, and in their synagogues (churches we mean). They oftimes pray with such whoops and yells, that we are forced to believe they either think their Gods are deaf, or that they are far off. They seem to forget entirely in this respect, the example and teachings of Christ for he says: "And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly." Matt. 6: 5 6. Christ when he prayed, wished to be entirely alone. He would not permit even a second person to be present. It seems that he wished to concentrate his thoughts, and to give himself up for the time being, to his supplications. This he could not have done, had he allowed any one to be present. And can either men, or women, pray in public now without being affected by their audience? Is it not in many instances the case, that their prayers are offered more to their congregations than to their Gods? Do they not sometimes forget the cause for which they are fighting, and wonder what the people thinking are of their eloquent prayer?

Are our prayers answered? Is there a personal God, who takes cognizance of all our acts, and, who holds himself in readiness to grant the many and conflicting demands made upon him? Even granting there is a personal God, and that he has no higher ambition than to become the slave or tool of a destroying people, could he answer only a thousand of the orders given him in one day? Tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, and even millions of prayers are offered to him upon one Sabbath alone, and to us it does not seem possible that he could answer all of these, unless he has an army of angels at his command, whose business flying through the air in every direction, is to answer these prayers which are too often silly and unmeaning. We think it would not be much heaven to the poor angels, and God must be very tired when night comes, after a day of such arduous toil, in issuing so many orders. It is said, the Sabbath was first instituted as a day of rest, because God rested upon that day, but it seems they have turned the tables on the old man, and now, make him do double duty on that day. But then, they tell us, that God is omnipotent; and that all things are possible with him. Granting this to be the case, does he not often find himself occupying a very unpleasant position, for instance, a minister in one church may be praying for a particular favor, and at the same time, another minister in another church, may be praying for something in exact opposition to the first. So, also, when two armies are about going into battle, both claiming God to be on their side, they pause a few moments before entering upon the deadly conflict, to ask him to bless them with victory. Now what is he to do? But again, they tell us, that he is omniscient; that he knows of what things we are in need before we ask, and if he has his plans all perfected, his mind being made up upon the subject, and if, as they tell us, he is a God who never changes, will he change his plans to suit our prayer, when we have repeated it over to him?

Not long since, the elder and stationed minister of the church to which we then belonged, called upon us, to look after the interests of our soul. They had a great deal to say about grace, and closed by praying for us, and our household. They may have done, and [illegible] do this with the very best of motives, but the impression we received [illegible] church was a grand play; that the ministers and their dupes were the actors, and that this was one scene in the drama.

As a mental exercise, and as a means of self examination, prayer may do good, but we think this may be accomplished as well by meditation when we are performing our daily duties as in prayer. In the humblest cottage by the river side, or upon the bosom of the great deep, the soul may aspire to a sublime degree of perfection, and God or the angels may bless that spirit as well there as in the most fashionable and costly temple ever reared by man.

Spirit Memory.

BROTHER JONES:—In the Banner of Light, of the 26th of February, 1870, I noticed a very able and interesting article from the pen of Allen Putnam, Esq., of Boston, Mass., upon "Spirit memory." The article embraced and touched upon all the points relating to the subject, but the author did not seem satisfied with his own presentation of what Swedenborg and Parker said in regard to it.

I do not know that I can throw much positive light upon the subject, but propose, first, to state some facts in regard to it, which were given to me in a communication by the spirit of Professor Hare.

Upon one occasion I asked him, through the mediumship of Dr. O., whether he remembered a circumstance which transpired while I was a student of the University of Pennsylvania, viz., the discharge of his immense electrical battery by a meddling student, when it was almost ready for his lecture and experiments. His answer was, that as an advanced spirit, he did not; but, that to do so, it would be necessary for him to refer to his external memory, or, in other words, that he could only regain it by controlling, or coming in contact with the aura eliminated from some medium, then he would be able to recall, or remember every act or event of his earth life.

Upon another occasion, he stated, that the spirit after passing from earth life, progressed, and as it did so, it gradually lost the remembrance of all that was of no use to it in spirit life; consequently, even their names, (especially their Christian names) are eventually entirely lost to them.

I have had corroborative evidence, also, from other sources, which go to prove that the above statements are correct; but there is a diversity of opinion in regard to whether or no the spirit is dependent upon the medium for words, or for the language spoken by them while having control of an organism.

I am inclined to believe that they are not necessarily so, and the fact that many of our mediums, who have no knowledge of the French, Italian, Spanish, German, Latin, and other languages, speak them fluently when under spirit control, would go to prove, that the language not being familiar to the medium, could not be obtained from them.

So, too, the peculiar pains, sickness, distress, and natural characteristics of the spirit often exhibited by mediums under control, would also show that the spirit upon entering a medium, carried with it its own peculiar earth feelings and conditions, and, therefore, can not be considered as originating with the medium.

The statement of the spirit of Parker, "backed and explained by Swedenborg," viz., "that he was dependent upon his medium, while in control for his thoughts and words and memory of them, etc.," I think can be explained by comparison, or upon philosophical principles; and as there is an analogy between a spirit controlling a medium and a spirit in the natural body while in a somnambulic condition, it is but natural and reasonable to suppose that they would possess similar powers, and that if spirits, when controlling a medium, knew their powers, or, that it was necessary to resolve to remember, they could do so as well as persons who are in a somnambulic condition.

I have generally found it necessary to request persons who are in a somnambulic condition (especially the first time they entered it) to make a resolution that they will remember all that transpired before they awake, or they will remember nothing that has taken place while they were in that condition, yet when they enter the state again they remember all that took place when they were in the condition before, and if they then resolve to remember, they will know all when they awake that transpired upon former occasions.

It is, therefore, more than likely that the reason why spirits controlling mediums seem to depend on them for "words, and the memory of them," etc., is, because they do not make the necessary resolution that they will remember what they said, etc., before they give up their control.

The facts, therefore, taken collectively, would seem to prove that spirits controlling only borrow the organism of the medium, as we would a musical instrument, to play upon, or a tool to work with, and that upon ceasing to control, they carry no memory of what has transpired while holding control with them, simply because they do not resolve to do so before they retire, consequently, upon controlling another organism they do not remember what took place during the previous control of a different medium.

In regard to the spirits' memory in spirit life, I have but to add, that as the organs of the brain in earth life are composed of different functions, which are peculiar in each faculty—and memory being one of these functions, and necessarily peculiar in each, it requires the association of certain memories to remember certain ideas, etc.

Now, if the remembrance of acts, deeds, pleasures, sorrows, or a knowledge of good or evil be carried into the spirit world. The spirit must possess the functions that were natural to it in earth life, or there would be no remembrance at all, consequently, there could be no compunctions for evil deeds done in the body, nor happiness resulting from convictions of having done well.

The non-existence of the one necessarily precludes the possibility of the existence of the other. Therefore, the spirit in earth life, upon entering the spirit world, is the spirit minus the natural body only in spirit life, and consequently carries with it all its peculiar qualities, whether good or evil, and will have to bear the consequences of the one, and reap the benefits of the other; but there can be no doubt that as the spirit progresses, it will gradually lose the recollection of all that is of no use to it in spirit life.

The faculty of reading or knowing the mind being more perfect in spirits, will give us an idea of how they realize or know each other's condition at a glance.

—Fool! thy neighbor's goods will burn thee up if thou retainest them long in thy possession. Hasten to restore them without delay.

Voices from the People.

OTTUMWA, IOWA.—S. B. Wills writes.—I inclose you post office order for three dollars, for arrearages on subscription to the JOURNAL. I owe you an apology for not remitting before, as we find it indispensable and can not think of doing without it—must have it.

DAVENPORT, IOWA.—John Wilder writes.—Please send me No. II of the JOURNAL, as it has never come to hand. I want to keep along with Brother Francis in his "Search after God," but it will not be complete without that missing number. I take great interest in the search,—not fearing that he is going to destroy my God, for he is the God of Nature and not Moses' God, or like the orthodox gods of Davenport, who are kept locked up in big strong castles, having tall, pointed towers, showing that gods of some kind are kept there. Any one looking at these structures will perceive that the gods occupying them are gods of different proclivities. Once a week these strongholds are opened, and the people are permitted to come into the presence of God if they can assume a certain sanctified air, and say they love him, and believe the blood of Christ will save them in that great day that they are all anxiously waiting for, but I have not seen one single individual who has ever seen God in one of these edifices, or ever heard him speak. But they all know that these are God's houses, and that he is pleased to meet with them there.

CADIZ, IND.—J. Bond writes.—I send two dollars. Please send me the Hindoo Testament, and if it comes safe, I will send two more for the Hindoo Bible. I wish to say a few words in reply to Maria M. King concerning evil spirits,—that evil disposed ones are not allowed to interfere in the affairs of men. Now this has a large alloy of orthodoxy to me. The question is, what is the power? Does God control spirits and men, or the spirit world thus here? If he does, then he is changeable. Who gives them power to destroy property, cut up garments, etc?

AMADORE MICH.—J. D. Waterman writes.—Your excellent paper comes regularly to hand, laden with all the good things necessary to please the most fastidious. Your "Search after God" is a most wonderful production. I sincerely hope it may be placed before the public in pamphlet or book form immediately—in such case, forward to me address at once. I shall respond with the needful.

KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.—T. Pope writes.—The RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, from its birth, has been a welcome paper. Each week its onward and upward march with intense emotions of delight, and have labored, not without success, for its growth.

FLORA, ILL.—N. A. Gurney writes.—You will find three dollars inclosed for renewal of subscription up to June 23d, 1872. I am pleased to state that Brother Francis would find what he has so long been in search of if he would turn short around and take the back track. I do not think the individual or principle has been far off at any time.

TROY, IND.—J. D. Bacon, M. D., writes.—I will take this opportunity of returning to you my sincere thanks for your kind favor of sending the JOURNAL to my address for upwards of a year. Many papers come to my address which are worthless, without any exception, and I often find out what they are, I refuse to take them, but of all my mail matter, the JOURNAL is prized the most, for its pages are flowing with living words of truth, which will aid us in our onward journey of life; for man must understand himself and his high destiny before he can make life a success, and nothing is so well calculated to unfold to the mind the beautiful laws of life, physical, mental and moral, as the Harmonial Philosophy. You shall hear from me again in the way of pecuniary support.

WHITEWATER, WIS.—Zerah Mead writes.—You will find inclosed money order for three dollars, for the JOURNAL for one year. I have been taking it on three months' trial, which expires on the 9th, according to the statement on the margin. Am no Spiritualist, but have been an interested skeptic, and was induced by a friend to read the five volumes of A. J. Davis' "Harmonial Philosophy," which has created a desire to know more, and in reading in the JOURNAL the letter of Mr. Hardi go and some others, I have been obliged to yield many of my former objections, so very convincing do I find the reasoning of Mrs. H. There is much in the paper that I do not admire, but for the sake of the good, it is worth to me what you charge.

AI, OHIO.—A. Richards writes.—I like your paper very much; it is out-spoken, independent, liberal and friendly to free inquiry. The "Search after God" is especially interesting to me, and I would take several more adjectives to fully describe it. It must be doing a great work in awakening thought on the great subjects which have occupied the attention of mankind ever since they entered on of the animal plane of existence. Mr. Francis' "Search after God" is very interesting. He seems to have found out a new God, and has advanced ideas and taken positions that are new to popular society. If they are true, all facts will go toward substantiating them, and if they are not true, the sooner they are exposed before the world, discussed and refuted, the better. So that good will come out of it any way. A word in relation to the "Hollow Globe." It is the most interesting scientific work I ever read, and I believe the antipodites of the world will have a hard job before them to refute some of the arguments against their pet theories in relation to the globe, and scientific matters connected therewith.

AUBURN, N. Y.—H. S. Leonard writes.—I have been favored with the privilege of reading the JOURNAL since its first publication, and still welcome its golden truths.

ENTERPRISE, MISS.—P. Sheldt writes.—As for the JOURNAL, I would not lose sight of it for anything in this world. It is the light which can not be confined under a bushel.

RUTLAND, WIS.—Nancy Philo writes.—I like your valuable paper very much, especially the "Search after God" and the communications. They are cheering words to my weary soul as I journey alone through this world of sorrow toward that haven of eternal rest. I think I shall remain a life subscriber.

DEXTER, ME.—G. Plummer writes.—We like the paper much for its bold and manly course in exposing the errors of humanity. I like it like the "Search after God," which is food for me, and many who read my paper.

WARREN, OHIO.—I. D. Bliss writes.—I wish to say one word in regard to Dr. McFadden and wife. I stopped with them one week last summer, and if there exists a pure minded man and woman on the earth, I believe them to be Dr. McFadden and wife.

ST. ANTHONY, MINN.—W. W. Getchell writes.—I have decided that for the present the JOURNAL is a necessity with me, and as the printer, like other men, must live, I herewith inclose this small amount to put me right on the record, and wish you all success in every effort to arouse thought and investigation, and break the shackles of priestcraft and superstition that have reddened so many fields with blood, and saddened so many hearts that would otherwise have bubbled over with joy and gladness.

WICHITA, KANSAS.—S. M. Tucker writes.—After so long a time I will make a small remittance for the JOURNAL, for we can not do without it.

NEW EDITION—REVISED AND CORRECTED.

THE VOICES

Three Poems.

VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.
VOICE OF NATURE.
VOICE OF A PEBBLE.

By Warren Sumner Barlow.

THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is destined to make an impression among sectarian bigots than any work that has hitherto appeared.

THE VOICE OF SUPERSTITION takes the creeds at their word, and proves by numerous passages from the Bible that the God of Moses has been defeated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Calvary!

THE VOICE OF NATURE represents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While others have too often only demolished, it is either here erected a beautiful Temple on the ruins of superstition. Judge Baker, of New York, in his review of this poem, says: "It will unquestionably cause the earth to be cleared among the ablest and most gifted disciples of the age."

THE VOICE OF A PEBBLE delineates the individuality in matter and Mind, fraternal Charity and Love.

The book is a repository of original thought, awaking noble conceptions of God and man, forcible and pleasing in style, and is one of the few works that will grow with its years and mature with the centuries. It is already attested by its thousands of readers.

Printed in beautiful type, on heavy, fine paper bound in beveled boards, in good style; nearly 200 pages. Price $1.25, postage 16 cents. Very liberal discount to the trade. For sale by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 South Clark St., Chicago, Ill.,

SECOND EDITION.

A WORK OF GREAT RESEARCH.

ONE RELIGION: MANY CREEDS.

BY ROSS WINANS.

"We object to what the Church demands, an unbounded and unjustifiable confidence in the infallibility of the writings of Moses and the prophets, and the Evangelists and the Apostles. We object to what the Church demands, to an impossible compound of God and man. We protest that Christian theology, as we have it, is not taught by God himself, nor by Christ himself, nor is it consistent with established facts, nor is it comprehensible by our reason. We would show you that Christian ty, as taught among us is no better than other systems taught in other than Christian countries, and in some respects not so good.

The historic part of the Bible, in relation to the creation of the world, has be counterpart also in the several systems of theology here mentioned. They all had their cosmologies based on equally good authority and equally wide of the truth, as that contained in the Bible. The time and manner of the creation, no man has ever known, or ever will know, in this life; nor is such knowledge of importance in preparing us for the life to come."—EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

This book is a large 12 mo. of nearly 400 pages, printed on fine, heavy-tint d paper, and is sold at much less than the actual cost. Price, $1.50; postage, 32 cents.

BY.....E. V. WILSON

Frothingham, Collyer, Conners, and others vs. Spiritualism.

We remember very well the time when the Spiritualists of Chicago had Collyer on the brain, were ready to fall down and worship at the feet of this man; and we heard from prominent Spiritualists, such expressions as follows:

"Bro. Collyer is with us heart and soul."

"Wait a little, and Collyer will be with us,—on our platform."

"What do you think happened yesterday?" said a good, earnest Spiritualist to us, some two years ago. We replied, "We can not tell. What was it?"

"Well, sir, Mr. Robert Collyer actually spoke for us in Music Hall."

"He did?"

"Yes, sir."

"How did that happen?"

"Why, you see, it was in this wise. Mr. Orvis was to speak, and failed. Mr. Collyer came just in the nick of time, and was invited to speak for us, and consented. And don't you think, that when on the platform, he put his hands into his pocket, pulling out a sermon, saying, 'When I left home, I was impressed that I should be called on to speak, so I thought that I would put a little ammunition into my pocket, hence I have one of my old sermons with me.' Well, sir, that sermon was just as good a Spiritual sermon as I wish to hear,—and then he was impressed, you know. I tell you, sir, that Mr. Collyer is just as good a Spiritualist as you are, or I am, and in less than one year, you will see him an outspoken Spiritualist."

"Well, sir, when that takes place we will yield the point, and take Mr Collyer by the hand, and call him a Spiritualist, but not before. Now, we will tell you something. In less than one year, Mr. Collyer will denounce Spiritualism, kicking it out of his thoughts."

And he has done so, as reported in the Chicago papers.

The next idol was O. B. Frothingham. The late Universe, the Banner of Light, especially Bro. Peebles departments, the Present Age, the American Spiritualist under its former management, and other spiritual papers now non est, praised, eulogized, loved, hugged, kissed, quoted, and swore by Frothingham.

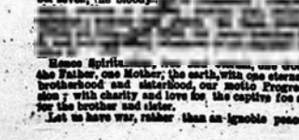
Two years ago, we cautioned our readers and the Spiritualists everywhere, to be careful,—cautious. Collyer had kicked us hard, Frothingham would sting us, and that men bound by creeds were not to be trusted by Spiritualists. How true our words. Collyer kicked us in Chicago. Weiss, some time ago, gave us the knife in Boston. Conway hit us a hard blow in London. Greeley pronounces Spiritualism glamour. Brecher wrote Haddock, that he was not a Spiritualist. And now Frothingham is out with an article in a late number of the Index, headed "Spiritualism and Superstition," in which he shows his teeth, and makes the weak-kneed babes and reformed preachers in our ranks wince.

The Radical, Liberal Christian, Independent, Golden Age, Index and others of their ilk, have published, now and then, a liberal idea or article on Spiritualism. Does it follow that they are devoted to spiritualism, or their editors Spiritualists, or even favorable to Spiritualism? Will they stand by us in our hour of trial? Shall we not by and by receive just as sturdy blows, with equal hate and scorn from their papers, their editors, as we have from the ministers, writers and editors above referred to?

Spiritualists can not serve two masters, or live under two gods. Spiritualists are not Christians, in any sense of the term implied, expressed or understood. Spiritualism is not Christianity any more than Jesus was a Pharisee.

Only think of President O. B. Frothingham, refusing to exchange pulpits with A. J. Davis; then, as President of the Free Association in its late convention in Boston, stabbing a large number of Spiritualists in charging Spiritualism with building up a new superstition. In speaking of Spiritualists, he withheld from us our distinctive appellation, and designated us as Spiritists; and yet we have men and women in our ranks who run after these wolves in sheep's clothing, joining with and buying their works, to be kicked in return by their masters. Spiritualists, why will you support the viper instead of the dove? Hundreds and thousands of Spiritualists are unwarily by the Frothinghams, Collyers and company, taking their organs, buying their publications, thus sustaining their common foe, to be abused by them so soon as they are able, from the money paid them by Spiritualists, to publish the abuse. The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, Banner of Light, American Spiritualist, Crucible and the Analysis furnish better and purer reading matter for brain food than all of these so-called free religious papers, magazines or books put together. Why, then, continue to warm the viper that never fails to sting you when opportunity offers?

As soon as Jesus began to preach, he drew a sharp line of demarcation between the religion of the Jews and his, and he never went back over that line, and whenever a Jew came to him, he had to stand on his side of the line. So Spiritualism has drawn a bare line of operations, and will not go behind it. We will not tolerate a creed or stake or settled speakers. Spiritualism is the mountain, free Christianity, or any other Christianity the mouse. Hence the mice must come to the mountain, and not the mountain to the mice.



Spiritualism has never retreated a step. Some of its followers have gone back, and think because they have turned back to the flesh pots of Egypt, Spiritualism has gone.

Science, religion, Christianity and free religionists are coming to us; we are not going to them. Hence, let Spiritualism continue its fire into the enemy's camp—into the strongholds of our common foe, the priesthood and their creeds, and soon their strong places will be tumbled down about their ears and they will run up the white flag.

Every split in the old institutions, every dissension, every wrangle among our enemies is a gain to us. Then let us hold no parley with the old or new form of creedal intolerance until the old structure is leveled with the ground, and then such material as we find in the debris of use to us we will use, and none other.

There must not remain a particle of the old leaven, mortar, plaster, papering or paint on the material we use in the building up of our temple. The material must be pure. Hence we do not need the Collyers, Frothinghams, Conners or Weiss's: the Radical, Index, Independent, Liberal Christian, Golden Age, or the semi-Unitarian, Universalist, Spiritistic Present Age. They are in need of us; we are gaining on them; they are not gaining on us.

Let us continue the fire until there is a full surrender. No Mason and Dixon's line for us; no compromise of '40 or '50. We have carried the following strong fortifications: No. one, hell fire; number two, eternal damnation; number three, total depravity; number four, infant damnation; number five, physical [illegible]

Fort Trinity, with its t[illegible] ber seven, the blood[illegible]

House Spiritualism, the one true God, the Father, one Mother, the earth, with one eternal brotherhood and sisterhood, our motto Progression; with charity and love for the captive foe as for the brother and sister.

Let us have war, rather than an ignoble peace.

Letter from Wm. R. MacKay.

BROTHER JONES:—I am sorry to inform you of the sad misfortune that has befallen our worthy, respected friend, P. B. Jones, photographer, of this city. He has been burned out of house and home, and lost nearly everything, a second time in the same house. The other fire he lost all—no insurance; this time, almost the same. It looks hard that such good, noble men have to suffer so much on this plane. If there ever was a kind-hearted man he is one, which many a poor, worn-out, deserted medium can testify to. His house was open at all times for poor and worthy mediums who had no money to pay any one for staying over all night. He will take it very kindly of you to mention the facts of the case, so that his friends at a distance may know of his disaster. A few years ago I could have helped him myself, but I am sorry to say that I am poor myself at present. Old Solomon was right about money matters.

Davenport, Iowa, Sept. 5, 1871.

We deeply sympathize with our unfortunate namesake. We know him personally to be a worthy, honest man, and hope those who have an abundance, will remember him in this his hour of trial and suffering.—ED. JOURNAL.

Clairvoyance.

TO THE PUBLIC:—We the undersigned, having employed Dr. D. P. Kayner, of St. Charles, Ill., in the treatment of very difficult cases with very successful results, cheerfully recommend him as a safe, skillful and scientific physician and reliable clairvoyant.

Spalding Eddy, Alexander V. Sill, M. M. Baldridge, L. Howard.

St. Charles, Ill., Sept. 9th, 1871.

Dr. Kayner is very successfully treating patients in all parts of the United States, by a small lock of hair. Terms, $2.

LITERARY.

The Federati of Italy. A Romance of Caucasian Captivity. By G. L. Ditson, M. D. Boston, Wm. White & Co., publishers.

For a gentleman of the high attainments and large experience gained from long study and extensive travels, who is already the author of numerous stories and scientific papers to put together such a hodge-podge as he has in 319 pages with the above title, is indeed remarkable. The doctor seems to have had a large amount of facts, which having highly colored with his rich imagination, he felt bound to give to the public, and instead of writing several stories, has thrown all this rich material into one. The publishers have done their part well, as they always do. The book, like everything from the press of this enterprising firm, is perfect in its appearance.

Lecture by Horace Greeley.

Horace Greeley will deliver a lecture at Farwell Hall, on September 20th; subject, "Self-made Men." We feel confident that the name of the lecturer and his subject will draw out a crowded house.

☞ Those who preserve every number of this volume of the JOURNAL will not regret it in the future. We will also suggest to those who have No. 18 of last volume, that they will probably have a use for it in the future, therefore it will, be well to preserve that also.

THOSE WHO WISH to have this paper discontinued when the time is up to which it is paid for, should notify us of that wish two weeks before such time expires, as it takes that time to get it out of the mailing machine. When an order to discontinue is given by those in arrears, remittances should be made to square up in full, including the two weeks which the paper will be mailed the subscriber after such notice is given.

An Entirely New Proposition.

We now have in press, and will be ready to fill orders before this notice reaches our readers a splendid new book, entitled The SUNDAY QUESTION, and SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE.

This work consists of 123 large, closely printed pages. It is an exhaustive review of the so-called Sunday question, and self-contradictions of the Bible. The work shows the so-called divine authority for the supposed holy day, to be the cunning device of designing priests rather than the inspiration of an Infinite God! This work, which we sell for the low price of fifty cents, and send the same free of postage on the receipt of the money, we will send to any old subscriber on receipt of seventy-five cents, together with the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL to any new subscriber on trial for three months; or, we will send the same work and the JOURNAL for three months on trial direct to a new subscriber, on the receipt of seventy-five cents. For one dollar, we will send for a new subscriber, the JOURNAL three months and the above-named book, together with that very remarkable book called LIFE'S UNFOLDINGS, or The Wonders of the Universe Revealed to Man.

We hope that every subscriber to whom we are now sending the JOURNAL will avail him or herself of this generous offer, and thus secure these books, as well as to thus aid in doubling the number of the subscribers to the JOURNAL.

Mrs. Robinson's Tobacco Antidote.

The most certain and perfectly harmless antidote for the poisonous effects, and remedy for the tobacco appetite, is known by the above name.

It is compounded by Mrs. A. H. Robinson, the celebrated medium of Chicago, while entranced by a celebrated chemist long in spirit life. This antidote is warranted to break the habit of using tobacco by the inveterate lover of the weed, when the directions (on each box) are followed.

Agents for selling the same throughout the country are wanted. For sale, wholesale and retail, at this office. Price $3.00 per box—sent by mail free of postage, on receipt of the money.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHS.

MADAME DOHERTY, having secured his connection with A. D. WILLS, at Chicago, has opened a Gallery, at Indianapolis, Indiana, where he will sit for spirit pictures.

Parties at a distance wishing those pictures can get the same result as if present, by inclosing a lock of hair, a picture, and the fee of three dollars, and post office stamp, stating the fact and how they wish a trial. Money refunded if no result is obtained.

Obituary.

Dr. D. T. Haynes entered spirit life from the residence of Dr. Carpenter, Kendallville, Indiana, on the 31st of August, 1871, of lung disease.

Dr. Haynes was a healing medium, formerly of Cortland, Kent Co., Mich.

He leaves a beloved wife, aged father, brother, and sisters, all fully initiated into Spiritual philosophy.

Thanks to the Christian disciple or minister, and the members of his congregation, for opening their church and attending the funeral services, showing humanity to the Spiritualists and free religionists of Kendallville. May they have many spiritual visits, and communion with their own dear departed ones to comfort their hearts.

Passed to spirit life, June 30th, 1871, Juliette, wife of Hiram Hammond, aged 56 years, of Eaton Rapids, Mich.

For seventeen years this family was the rallying-point of circles, lecturing and visiting pioneers of the Spiritual movement of a great extent of country.

The deceased possessed a clear and sound mind in natural philosophy and spiritual unfoldment—consistent and unwavering—calm and undoubting.

Departed from Cedar Bluffs, Iowa, August 18th, 1871, Mary K. Howard, aged 70 years and six months. She was long a firm Spiritualist, and a woman of more than ordinary intelligence. A large circle of loving friends mourn her absence from the physical form, but feel confident that she still lives.

NOTICE OF MEETINGS.

SEMI-ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The Spiritualists of Hancock county, Maine, will hold their Fourth Semi Annual Convention in Ellsworth, Saturday and Sunday, October 7th and 8th, commencing at ten o'clock A. M.

A cordial invitation is extended to all to come and participate with us and help propel the car of progress.

By order of the Committee,

JUST PUBLISHED!

A Complete and Truthful History of that Good Man and

PRINCE OF MEDIUMS,

Jesus of Nazareth

BY

PAUL AND JUDAS,

Through Alexander Smyth, Medium.

This work has been read with intense interest by thousands, and is universally pronounced the most in the whole line of Spiritualistic Literature. It is the only true and reliable history of the remarkable medium called Jesus, ever written. After waiting eighteen hundred years, PAUL and JUDAS, finding the times propitious, and an excellent medium through whom to communicate, have given to the world a book of lasting interest, by taking possession of Mr. Smyth about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well-connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was, probably, no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed, that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end, and contains 319 closely-printed pages.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago,

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognisance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

MRS. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well who the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $3.00; each subsequent, $2.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $3; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had in this class. It is written for women; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a book both for young people to read, for any body indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

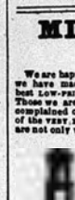
Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:



"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

Price, $1.50; postage, 18 cents. Address RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 S. Clark street, Chicago.

MICROSCOPES.

We are happy to announce to our numerous readers that we have made arrangements to be supplied with the very best LOW-PRICED MICROSCOPES that are manufactured. Those we are now handling have none of the deficiencies complained of in most cheap microscopes. They are made of the VERY BEST materials, are finished in GOOD STYLE, and are not only well adapted for use, but are also ORNAMENTAL.

No. 1655 MICROSCOPE,—Brass body,—6 inches high.—One Object Lens:—POWER 40 DIAMETERS.

Neatly packed in a Mahogany Case, with one prepared object, and sold for the low price of $3.00.

No. 1660, The UNIVERSAL NONPAREIL MICROSCOPE,—Price $5.50.—The Most Convenient, Complete, and Powerful Microscope ever offered for this low price.

It has the important parts of a first-class instrument, is readily adjusted, and will calculated not only to AMUSE, but to INSTRUCT. It has a firm tripod base of cast iron, and the facility for inclining to any angle, for convenience of observation; an adjustable eye piece or draw-tube, and two object glasses of different powers, with one prepared object, all packed in a neat wooden box with hinges and hooks. It has a magnifying power of 20 to 100 diameters, or 400 to 10,000 times the area.

We can heartily recommend either of the above instruments, and those who cannot afford the higher priced one, need not be deterred from sending for the other, for it will give them perfect satisfaction, though not admitting of so wide a range of observation and close examination.

☞ These Microscopes can be sent only by EXPRESS; they cannot go in the mails. Our friends will please recollect this when ordering and giving shipping directions.

PREPARED OBJECTS.

We have a large variety of objects neatly prepared and mounted on glass papered slides, well calculated for either of the above instruments. Price $1.50 per dos. or 15 cts. each. Must be ordered by express.

BOOK OF THE MICROSCOPE.

An interesting Book on the Microscope, with over 400 illustrations, and directions for collecting and preparing the objects will be sent to any address on receipt of 75 cents.

S. S. JONES, PUBLISHER AND PROPRIETOR. CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 30, 1871. VOL. XI.—NO. 2.

From the Salt Lake Tribune.

Were Joseph Smith's Revelations from Disembodied Spirits?

The purpose of this article is to treat on a principle very imperfectly understood, both by the world in general and Latter Day Saints in particular. The different religious sects, except ing the Latter Day Saints, do not believe in present revelation, because they consider the canon of scripture is full. The Latter day Saints profess to believe in revelations given in our days, as they suppose through resurrected beings, such as Peter, James and John, Nephi, Maroni and others who spoke to Joseph Smith. If any person should now profess to receive revelation, no matter what their nature or importance, as coming from disembodied spirits, they are immediately met with the reply, "O, we want none of that kind; that is Spiritualism. Any revelation that we believe in must come from resurrected beings."

I desire to meet this objection with all the respect and consideration it deserves, from the fact that it is the honest belief of thousands who consider it a point of doctrine or article of faith which cannot be overthrown. My purpose is to show from the published records of the Mormon church, and the history of Joseph Smith, that this idea is by no means substantiated, but that on the contrary, the opposite view of the subject is plainly conveyed, both by the facts narrated, and the language employed to describe them. In fact there is only one angelic person spoken of as possessing a natural body, and that was not a resurrected being, but one who had not experienced death; namely, Elijah, who is said in the Bible to have gone to heaven in a chariot of fire, without passing through the change called death.

If we refer to the Millennial Star, vol. 5, or the Pearl of Great Price, which contains the first portion of the history of Joseph Smith, we will find the statement that on a certain occasion when his mind was greatly agitated on religious matters, he retired to the woods to pray; and in answer to his prayer, had a vision, in which he beheld two personages, who satisfied his mind in relation to the subjects which were so greatly agitating him. He went to pray he was in his usual or normal condition. Now mark this statement; he says: "After I came to myself, I found myself on my back looking up into heaven." This certainly is not a very dignified position in which to carry on conversation with two resurrected beings, and those beings claiming to be Jesus Christ and God the Father. Now what was the impression left on Joseph's mind by this communication? Does he state that he saw two resurrected beings? Oh no, but he calls the whole, "a vision," and compares it to the vision of Paul, when on the road to Damascus, when he saw a light and heard a voice from heaven. To Joseph it was simply a vision of the mind, for he realized that he had been operated upon by spiritual beings, who had impressed certain ideas on his inspirational vision and other senses, while his bodily vision and natural senses were lying dormant. This is the distinct inference to be deduced from the whole account, and needs only to be carefully studied, by any one to arrive at the same conclusion, that is if truth is the object sought after. Hence, I think it is clear that the very first of Joseph's revelations were not from resurrected beings.

The next revelation that we have an account of in Joseph Smith's history happened about three years after receiving the vision last spoken of, and is the most distinct and circumstantial account left on record by him of any spiritual communication which he professed to have received, and it may be said that if this account is carefully studied and properly understood and accepted as true, it will settle forever the question concerning the bodily nature of heavenly beings. I take the account just as it stands, for it is evidently a truthful record of Joseph's experience. He says, while in the act of calling on God in prayer, a light appeared in his chamber, which increased in brightness, until he saw a personage at the bedside, standing in the air, for "his feet did not touch the floor." He describes this personage as a very glorious being. He distinctly saw his arms, hands, feet and also his bosom, and the robe he had on. In fact he saw a man; at first he was afraid, but the fear soon left him. This being told Joseph his name was Nephi, and Joseph says he held a long conversation with him on various subjects. Now mark the conclusion of the interview. After he, Joseph, had received the communication, he saw the light in the room begin to gather around the personage, until the room was left dark, and instantly a conduit or passage was opened up into heaven, and the messenger ascended up the conduit until he entirely disappeared; and this communication or vision was thrice repeated the same night, with the same accompaniments. Now the question arises, if the angel or messenger possessed a resurrected body of flesh and bone, how could he ascend through the ceiling of the room, without an opening being there? Joseph says the room was left as before, and he also calls this "a vision," that is he beheld it with his spiritual and not his bodily sight, and he remarks that the effect on his system was such that he was unable to labor as usual on the next day.

Again, if this being had possessed a body of natural flesh and bone, he would not only have required an opening through which to enter and depart from the chamber or house, but his approach would have been heard; for matter acting or vibrating on matter necessarily makes a sound sensible to the natural ear. But we do not read of any sound being heard at his approach. Again, his appearance would not have been instantaneously observable, but his approach would have been gradual, and have taken time; but Joseph speaks as though he travelled by the power of his will, for his feet did not touch the floor and both his appearance and disappearance took place almost instantaneously. The whole account going to prove that the laws which governed the motions of this heavenly being were different from the laws governing our motions, or that would govern the motions of a being who was clogged with a material body similar to the one we now possess. Hence we may confidently infer that the second great manifestation or revelation received by Joseph Smith was not from a resurrected being.

There are a number of other passages in the records which could be referred to in order to illustrate the subject before us, but I will pass over these, and speak of the communications received in the temple at Kirtland, Ohio, as recorded in Joseph Smith's history, Millennial Star, vol. xv, pages 726, 729 and 739. This account distinctly states that great preparations were made by Joseph Smith and those associated with him, for an extraordinary display of spiritual power and angelic visitation. These preparations were made by direction of revelations previously received, leading them to expect such manifestations; therefore they were prepared to observe them when they came, which was not the case in the previous instances, because the visitations were not so fully expected. And what is seen on this occasion? A light was seen by some to rest on the building, which attracted the attention of those outside; and spiritual personages were seen inside. But were they seen by all there assembled? Oh, no! Only certain individuals who had that gift saw them and described them. Joseph says there was a voice heard like the sound of a mighty rushing wind, and the temple was filled with angels. Which fact he declared to the congregation. Now if these angels were resurrected beings, in the common understanding of that term, how was it the congregation could not perceive them without resorting it necessary for Joseph to declare it to them? Again on another occasion, Joseph says: "The veil was taken from our minds and the eyes of our understanding were opened," referring to himself and Oliver Cowdery. And he goes on to state that they saw certain angelic or heavenly beings, one of whom he calls Jehovah, others, Elijah, Elias and Moses. But he does not infer for us, from his earlier education, did consider in some cases (though not in all, especially those he calls visions) that the personages he saw were really resurrected beings. But there are several weighty reasons why the opinions he entertained in his undeveloped condition should not be considered as final authority. If we were to question him today on this subject we would find that he entertains, not only ideas, but knowledge greatly at variance with his former opinions.

The one great reason which covers all the rest why his former opinions should not be taken as final authority on this subject is, that Joseph in his ignorance considered all spiritual manifestations as miraculous. That is to say, that they were not regulated by any known law, but were manifested by the will of God without any reference to any fixed natural laws. Whereas if he had been better informed in the science of spirit communications he would have understood that the spirit world and spiritual beings are controlled by law and order as much as the natural world and men in the body are; and that all communications that pass between the two worlds are regulated by natural law, whether it is so understood by the recipient or not. And this is the lesson that Joseph Smith now desires to teach his brethren, the Latter-day Saints. And when he can so teach them as to teach them his important principle there will be some hopes of their receiving the like manifestations that he did. It is most important for us to understand to some extent the laws which govern spiritual beings and spiritual communications for if we are looking for resurrected beings to communicate with us and show themselves to our natural vision, we are likely to be disappointed; but if we seek for our spiritual faculties to be quickened, they can be so developed that spiritual beings can operate on our spiritual sensations and we shall be likely to attract to us those who can impart to us the knowledge we stand in need of. For rest assured it is only our ignorance of the necessary conditions that debars us from receiving revelations of the most cheering and valuable kind, for many of our brethren who have passed away are desirous to impart to us the truth concerning the spirit world, amongst whom is the Prophet Joseph Smith, who in his greatly progressed life is earnestly desirous to make known to us some of the truths he has learned since he passed away from earth life.

That this article may have a tendency to throw some light on the subject treated of, and create a desire for more, is my earnest wish.

ALFRED WARD.

Salt Lake City, July 27, 1871.

From the Spiritual Analyst.

Spiritual "Doubles."

The question has often been asked, Can the spirit leave the living body, without adducing death? A large collection of phenomena had suggested an affirmative answer, without authorizing a positive conclusion.

Mrs. Crowe in her interesting and instructive book on "The Night Side of Nature," concludes that in the state of catalepsy, "the freed spirits, free as the spirits of the actual dead"—can, and do leave the body; but catalepsy is so near akin to death, that the phenomena accompany it, is not explanatory of other phenomena belonging to healthy conscious life.

Mrs. Crowe considers this and finds it so difficult to support a theory that will explain the phenomena of the spiritual double, that she says: "All I hope or expect is to show that the question is not disposed of yet, either by the rationalists or the physiologists, and that it is still an open one." (p. 173, London Ed. 1854.)

Equally instructive is the chapter of Mr. Owen on "Apparitions of the Living" in his well-known work,—"Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World." The facts he quotes from others, as well as the illustrations he gives on the authority of living witnesses are all wonderful, and point to a common conclusion; but the difficulties attending the spirit's leaving the body and returning to it,—with the intermediate difficulty of supporting normal life during its absence, complicates the phenomena beyond the logic of his narrative and illustrations. The answer to the question therefore is still left to the intuition and science of the reader for construction, as facts of almost daily occurrence recall to mind those habits of Nature.

"A touching story is told, (and will illustrate) of a young sister of Alice and Phœbe Cary, whose early death was deeply lamented by her friends. A few weeks before her departure, and while she was still in health, she appeared for some minutes to be plainly visible in broad daylight to the whole family, across a little ravine from their residence standing on the stoop of a new house they were then building, though she was actually asleep at that moment in a bedchamber of the old house, and utterly unconscious of this counterfeit presentment, at some distance from her bodily presence. This incident is said to have given the sisters a strong interest in the phenomena of Spiritualism." (Revolution, April 8.)

Equally suggestive of the wonderful is the following experience of Mr. W. Hicks, who reports himself in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL of April 22 He says:—"About ten years ago, we were holding a circle at the house of Brother Duffee, and after sitting for about one hour, there was an intermission, during which I left the house and went away for a time. While I was absent in the physical form, there being present some eight or ten persons in the circle room, they all testified that they saw me come into the room by opening the outside door and shutting it again, and I passed through the room into another, which had no place of getting out again without my coming back into the circle room. My wife followed me into the room, but when she got there, I was not to be seen. While they were wondering where I was, I came into the room from the outside door.

"Now I ask, has man two bodies,—one physical and the other spiritual,—and can the latter leave under proper conditions, and both be conscious? or if, the spirit body is conscious, the physical is not? and, if the physical is conscious, the spiritual is not? Now, I ask these questions to see if there are others that have had similar experiences."

A further and still more complicated illustration of this double presentment is narrated by Florence Marryat in Harper's Weekly for December 24, 1870. "She states a sister of hers was staying with Mrs. Long during the absence of her husband, in a large country house surrounded by a fine park in Scotland. The husband of the hostess had gone to Edinburgh on business, expecting to be absent for two or three weeks. Her surprise was proportionately great on seeing him on horseback one afternoon riding along the road. He neared the park, but instead of turning into the drive, which was the longest way to the house, he suddenly checked his horse, and put him to the palings. Mrs. Long had seen the animal rise in obedience to the spur, clear the fence, but, jumping short of the ditch beyond it, fell with her husband under him. With a cry of dismay she rushed to the assistance of the struggling horse and rider, to find—nothing. Two days after the same thing happened again precisely as to time, place and circumstance. This time Mrs. Long was seriously frightened. She did not fear that the vision portended her husband's death; but she so far accepted it as a foreboding that she wrote to Edinburgh entreating Mr. Long on no account to return on horseback—a warning which seemed very unnecessary, as he invariably went backward and forward by train. But that epistle, as it afterward appeared, never reached the hand for which it was intended.

"On the succeeding day she received a few lines from her husband to say he should be at home that evening; and on the same afternoon she took my sister into the park to show her the exact spot where, she had twice experienced so mysterious a fright. They talked of presentiments and warnings on the way; but Mrs. Long was so happy in the anticipation of her husband's speedy return that she was conversing without any appearance of inability upon the subject, when, as they came to the rising ground before mentioned, she raised her eyes, changed color, and suddenly arrested her foot steps.

"'Helen!' she exclaimed, mentioning my sister's name. 'Look!—look out there! I see the same thing again!'

"My sister glanced in the direction intimated to her, and there, sure enough, she also saw the spectacle of a man riding on horseback along the turnpike-road, and apparently making for her friend's abode, but still to far off to be distinctly recognized.

"'My dear Mary,' she replied, 'that may be any one—a farmer or a servant. I see no marks by which to distinguish your husband.'

"But Mrs. Long did not answer her; she was staring at the fast-approaching rider; and my sister was fascinated by what she had heard, to watch with her in silence.

"On, on he came, just as had been described to her, in a quick canter, as though anxious to reach his home, until he had arrived at the drive-gates, and was about to enter them.

"Then he seemed to change his mind, to form a sudden wish to reach wife and children a few minutes earlier; and backing his horse, spurred him at the palings. At this juncture Mrs. Long grasped my sister's arm, but she did not speak; and they continued to gaze silently at this apparition, so strangely revealed to both of them at once.

"They watched the phantom horse and rider rise above the fence, and then fall heavily into the ditch below; the animal above the man, and struggling violently to get free of him. Firmly believing it was but a repetition of what the wife had viewed twice before, they yet involuntary ran up to the spot; when, instead of a myth, a vision, a mere presentiment, which should vanish at a second glance, they found a real horse lying on its side, a real man lying dead beneath him! Mrs. Long, having at the last moment accepted a friend's invitation to stay a night at his place, which lay between his own home and Edinburgh, had also accepted the loan of an animal to carry him for the last few miles—the last miles that he should ever traverse.

"What faculty in the wife's mind enabled her to see twice over an act which had not yet entered into the husband's mind to execute?

An analysis of these illustrations give the following points of verification: (1) evidence that something was seen; (2) that the phenomena was objective; (3) that the resemblance of the object was so like as to suggest to the beholders the idea of identity; (4) that this objective semblance was incorporeal to the other senses, although objectively real to sight; and (5) that the confirming testimonies of time, place and circumstance demonstrated the whole to have been an actual life experience, and not an illusion.

A further analysis however shows that the phenomena seen by Mrs. Long was a vision, developed by the spirits, who foresaw the order of succession in her husband's history, and advised her of its consequences. It differs from the mere double therefore in the complexity of its phenomena and the sources of its development. Both illustrate that "Coming events may cast their shadows before," to warn—perhaps—to save the beholder.

It must be obvious however on reflection that the agencies instrumental in the development of the two sets of phenomena, are widely different, since the first vision seen by Mrs. Long was two days in advance of the circumstance that brought the rider and horse together.

The cases of Miss Cary and Mr. Hicks therefore resolve themselves into simpler phenomena, and illustrate what occasionally takes place in well-conditioned spiritual circles. Indeed, the double is but the culmination of the Elements, for the development and concentration of which the circle is formed; for they form in fact, the medium, and become a connecting link between the spirits in an out of the body. They are human elements that eliminate from the organism in different degrees, and according to the different conditions of health and circumstances, but when they become so marked a characteristic of the individual as to form an atmosphere about the person, mediumship becomes organic to the possessor. To this characteristic of the mediumistic, the world is indebted for the halo surrounding the head of the "saints," which deepens into illumination and transfiguration under equally natural, but more spiritualistic conditions.

The proof of this is not in the assertion, but in the fact, that in well-conditioned spiritual circles, the spirits make use of these elements in giving an objective semblance of themselves. They take the human form, and seemingly float in the air. In some circles this outlined organism, has passed over the heads of its members, but dissolved into atmospheric conditions when touched or handled.

The phenomena is thus developed under certain conditions of mind and body, and at times reflect the individual, as at other times they reflect the circle. The nearness or remoteness of the double depends upon the reflecting capacity of the atmosphere, if we may generalize on the following from Western New York. The writer says—

"That to one standing at Mount Hope there appeared lifted in the entire north sky the blue waters of Lake Ontario, while reflected from them could be seen the mountains, hills, valleys, bays and rivers, or the Canada shore inland for miles. The coast could be plainly seen over a stretch of fifty miles, and so clearly at one time that the forests could readily be distinguished. Those present who were familiar with the Canada shore could readily distinguish Rice Lake, Belvidere, and other prominent points in Canada. The lake looked as though it had by a great tidal wave rolled upon Rochester, and covered one-half of the city, as no building could be seen north of Main Street, or any land between the city and the lake."—Rochester Express.

There is no need therefore of two spirits in one body to account for the presence of the spiritual double, any more than the above reflection of the lake and inland requires an extra force in Nature to justify its unusual appearance. It may not be to many minds as wonderful as the reflection of the spirit; but it is wonderful to those who read and study Nature with reverent eyes, and suggests one of the many methods by which nature makes beautiful the world of the spirit and the homes of the rejoicing.

Letter from D. P. Kayner, M.D.

According to appointment, I lectured in the Chronktown Schoolhouse, in Franklin, Saturday evening and Sunday forenoon, and at the Patten Schoolhouse, in Yorktown, Sunday evening, to large and attentive audiences, and with increasing interest.

On Sunday evening I called for a subject from the audience, and a lady presented "Idolatry," which my guides handled in their happiest manner, holding full control, and at the close a young man, who has heretofore been a preacher, arose and told the audience they had "listened to a great many sermons and lectures in that schoolhouse, but they had heard more grand truths, sublimely uttered, by Dr. Kayner in the last twenty minutes than in all the discourses that had ever been delivered in the house." Said he: "We have come here heretofore to listen to discourses on Death, but Dr. Kayner has taught us the lessons of Life, and let us be thankful we have heard them."

I then told them of the vision of the murders, and called upon Mr. Van Horn who was present and substantiated my statement.

I then called attention to the JOURNAL, solicited subscribers, and distributed several copies among them, which I trust you will hear from in the way of subscriptions.

On Saturday evening after the close of my lecture, the audience desired to witness the examination of a patient, with which wish, although completely exhausted with my journey and lecture, I complied. The examination was performed satisfactorily, in every way, both to the patient and audience.

Thus the work goes bravely on, the angels "working with us, and confirming the word with signs following."

St. Charles, Sept. 24th.

Mrs. Robert Dale Owen.

The funeral services were conducted by her husband, who made a very simple, touching address, which brought out the sweet and consolatory faith in which both have lived, and thousands who are, not ranked among Spiritualists find their joy and inspiration. He said:—"I believe, as she did, in the meeting and recognition of friends in heaven. While we mourn here below, there are joyful reunions above. Also, that the next world is one of many mansions, to be occupied by those who are fitted to enter therein, and this, because they are not by any earning of heaven; for which of us are faultless enough for that. Yet there are those prepared and those unprepared; and that determines our lot in the next world. I agreed with her also in the belief that there are in heaven duties, avocations, enjoyments even, as various as are those of earth; but far higher and nobler in scope and purpose. Finally, I believe, as she believed—as is so beautifully expressed throughout the ode we have been singing—in guardian care by the inhabitants of heaven exercised towards those of earth. As to the virtues and the good deeds of her who has left us, if nearly forty years' life and conversation in our village suffice not in witness, any word from me would be worse than worthless. Better to imitate her example than to speak her praise."—Golden Age.

Minnesota.

Several weeks ago St. Paul was excited by the Simmons elopement, an account of which affair has already been published in this journal. It will be remembered that after a few weeks' absence both of the eloping parties returned. Mrs. Burkman, the woman in the case, professed the utmost contrition, and was received with the greatest sympathy by the press and public. The Young Men's Christian Association took her in charge, and consigned her to the care of a prominent Methodist deacon, with a view to her entire reformation. On Tuesday last, by general consent, Simmons was granted an interview with her, and the next day the pair again eloped. Simmons, during his stay in St. Paul, had disposed of all his property, and collected all the money possible. Their return, it now appears, was merely to get affairs in better readiness for their final departure.—Exchange

REMARKS.—The Young Men's Christian Association did well. The deacon was kind, and his kindness is worthy of imitation. Simmons and Mrs. Burkman only used the old, threadbare religious cloak, which is daily used by millions of other professed Christians, as a garment under which the aforesaid Young Men's Christian Association and the deacon's better nature could be reached. Of course there was no "free love" beneath such a revered garment!

On motion of Geo. A. Bacon, a committee of five were appointed as a Business Committee: —Benjamin Starbuck, Amasa C. Robinson, Dr. Edwards, Sophronia E. Warner, and Rachel Walcott.

On motion, the delegates for each state were requested to present the names of one person for each of the following committees:—

One on Finance, one on Resolutions, one on Lyceums.

EIGHTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

The time for the assembling of our Annual Convention calls for the Report upon the condition of our cause.

Twenty-four years ago the term Spiritualism was almost unknown; now it is a household word, familiar to millions, looked upon, it is true, in different light according to the condition of the observer; and perhaps there is no better measure of man's condition than the appreciation he has of spiritual things.

In this view, it is gratifying to know that Spiritualism has claimed the attention of mankind more extensively, in the same length of time, than any other system which was ever presented to humanity.

Its acceptance has been unparalleled, and the bold demand for full and free investigation, which it has ever presented, has awakened an amount of inquiry which increases with every succeeding year.

For a time, men were content to sneer at and ridicule it, but as a natural consequence of its rapid progress, and through the constant presentation of its claims, these attacks, which were only those of the bigot and coward, became less frequent. Men and women in all ranks and conditions in society, found an wakening interest in this subject. Its continued demands for investigation have spread over all lands, and in almost every country there have been intelligent men and women free enough to examine into its merits, and whenever they have done this with a spirit of candor and justice, the result has been an acceptance of the fundamental principles of this grand Philosophy and Religion, that man is now a spirit; and, by virtue of his being a spirit is immortal; and, that his life is continuous and unbroken.

These facts have been established by abundant evidence, physical and mental, which has come to mankind from those who have gone into the spirit world; and we rejoice to know that these manifestations are increasing, and becoming more positive and satisfactory.

The universal demand of humanity, is to know what is man's destiny, and every fact in relation to this is of vast importance. How best to promote the spread of these vital truths, demands earnest consideration; the tendency of the age is toward individualism.

Arbitrary organizations are passing away, and many of those who find themselves released from the bondage of sectarian organizations and dogmatic rule, are not willing to enter into any organization that shall in the least trammel their free spirits.

Spiritualists have come out of all the different sects, and especially from the great unchurched family. Those who have left the church unsatisfied because it did not supply that substantial food for which their souls hungered, or those who have never been in these folds, furnish a very large proportion of the Spiritualistic ranks.

Many who were formerly open and avowed Materialists, are now among our numbers, as earnest and intelligent workers, and these, together with those who have not found that rest in the church which their souls demanded, have swelled our numbers to millions. Under these circumstances it is not possible we could form any very binding organization, nor is this at all desirable.

All that is needed is hearty and earnest co-operation in such good works as we can agree upon.

This association has struggled with many difficulties, still keeping in view the great object of its formation—that of establishing a central point around which other organizations might revolve with greater freedom and power than they could alone—a link to bind all the associations of the land into closer relations, without infringing upon the liberties of any. If this were carried out, our annual gatherings would become grand social and spiritual reunions, in which we should meet in fraternal relations, and strengthen each other for the practical work which lies before us.

The missionary labor can be accomplished better and more economically by the State organizations and local societies, wherever these exist. There are many localities, however, in which if we had the funds we could do a valuable missionary work.

The great cause in which we are engaged, and to which we are devoting the best energies of our lives, is not dependent alone upon the efforts of associations, or of individuals in this sphere. It originated in the spiritual world. Spirits are the architects, and we are but day-laborers, carrying the materials to the great temple which is being erected. We are to do a portion of the work which they cannot do. That the work is going on in every direction is evident. The facts and principles of Spiritualism are being spread broadcast over all lands. The invisible forces of the interior world are working everywhere; mankind are being moulded and turned into channels of which they had no consciousness, and in most instances they are ignorant of the causes which are producing these results. Thus is humanity growing more spiritual, and even those who are opposed to Spiritualism, or who may have heard very little of it, are experiencing these elevating and refining influences, and while they may be disposed to deny or repel all the manifestations which underlie our faith and philosophy, nevertheless they cannot possibly escape the effects. The crude and mathematical dogmas of theology are being softened and melted away and the people are demanding the bread of life and the waters of spiritual truth.

The growth of humanity must be seen from a spiritual stand-point to be properly realized. Mankind treasure up their tenderest feelings, and cover them from the rude gaze of the world, and only among the people there is much that is beautiful and attractive, and it is encouraging, both to spirits and mortals, to know that there is a steady progress in the race. However much there is to discourage us upon the external plane, there is a constant advance on the spiritual. Men are growing better and wiser every day, and the time is coming when they shall more effectually break the shell of selfishness, and go forth free.

The object of the spirits is to speak the truth to the people, knowing that it cannot be lost—that the utterance of any truth always affects the world. Let us, therefore, in our co-operation with the angel world go forth uttering the truths that are revealed to us—send them forth upon the wings of the wind, knowing that they will not return void.

During the past two months we have engaged the services of Eli F. Brown for the purpose of establishing lyceums and societies. His report is herewith appended.

We recommend that the subject of education and the children's progressive lyceums receive the careful and deliberate consideration of the association, and we trust that means will be devised for the more energetic prosecution of this work.

By the Treasurer's report it will be seen that, He has received.....$108.23
We have expended.....84.33

Leaving a balance of.....$23.90

The terms of office of Almon B. French and Robert T. Hallock expire at this time.

At a meeting of the Board held at Cleveland, Ohio, November 23d, 1870, J. S. Loveland offered in writing his resignation as a member of the Board, and Mrs. Susan C. Waters, of Bordentown, N. J., was elected by ballot for the unexpired term of J. S. Loveland.

At a meeting of the Board, held in New York City, May 10th, 1871, the resignation of Dorus M. Fox as Trustee, was presented by the President, and on motion it was accepted, and Edward S. Wheeler elected by ballot for the unexpired term of Dorus M. Fox.

Signed on behalf of the Board of Trustees:
HENRY T. CHILD, M.D., Secretary.

The following address was read and directed to be placed on the annals of the association:

At a public meeting of the members of the Utah Spiritual Movement, held at their new hall, the "Liberal Institute," on the evening of Sunday, the 27th of August, it was unanimously resolved that they be represented by letter at the forthcoming National Convention of Spiritualists to be held in Troy, State of New York, on September 12th, 1871.

ADDRESS.

The Utah Spiritual movement to the National Convention of Spiritualist, greeting: The members and friends of this association, recognizing it as an out-growth of the Great Common Spiritualistic Dispensation, by which those belonging to the higher sphere of humanity are awakening communication between themselves and every portion of mankind in mortality, send to the Spiritualists of the whole nation through their representatives in convention assembled expressions of love, fellowship, and co-laborship in the great cause.

The Utah Spiritual Movement publicly commenced to work in October, 1869. From its earliest inception it has had innumerable difficulties to contend with in the way of fanaticism and priestly power. Unlike movements started by the spirit world elsewhere, it has had to adapt itself to the mental growth of the people and travel up with them the widest expression of expansive thought. In this upward struggle it has manifested many degrees of growth and development, both in the idea it has propagated and in regard to its mode of action.

A people steeped in the idea of the necessity of divine leadership, and the greatest advocates of the doctrine of priestly organization that the world possesses, had to be gradually lifted up to a sense of the right of the human soul to judge of everything human or divine for itself. Hence, the spirit world counselled the temporary institution of an intermediate system,—a species of stepping-stone to greater liberties,—organized in the outset much in the external form of the Mormon priesthood, but minus its claims to arbitrary authority, or interference with temporalities. This form, as anticipated and provided for, was speedily outgrown, but the principles taught in connection with the organization being as high and broad as the most advanced conceptions of the Spiritual philosophy, have been expanding in their power and influence until to-day, as daring in thought as any in the world, and mentally and spiritually on a level with the rest of their brethren and sisters of the Spiritualistic world, the band of Utah Spiritualists, by this mode present themselves in your convention, claiming brotherhood and fellowship at your hands, and desiring to work with you in the common cause of human progress. The Utah Movement, which now for the first time represents itself in your councils, was planned in the spirit spheres for the threefold purpose of breaking down the one-man power existing in Utah, throwing open the country to the march of civilization and developing its wealth and resources for the benefit of the nation, and at one and the same time for the greater and nobler object of bringing the creed-bound inhabitants of this Territory into communication with the light and intelligence of the higher life. By the agencies raised up by the spirit world for this purpose, in spite of the ban and the anathemas of the Church, hundreds of the Church have been emancipated from the one-man power, and the spirit of the system broken. A free press has been established, and the mineral development of the Territory worked up; while on the Spiritualistic side hundreds have been made believers in the great truth of Spiritual communication, and a constantly increasing awakening of the minds of thousands.

These are some of the things which a Spiritual movement has given birth to, and they may furnish an answer to the question, "What is practical utility has Spiritualism accomplished?" If anywhere else, an illustration of its ability to deal practically with religious, political, and even financial evils, may be found here, where a representative of the Great Union Pacific Railroad declared to his company that the Tribune (the organ of the movement) had done more to develop the mineral resources of the country, encourage immigration, and increase the trade of the Great Railroad, than all other agencies in Utah put together. These points are referred to in a gratulation of the Great Spiritualistic Cause, to which the Utah Movement stands but as one of a thousand centres of action, and as a prophecy of what the agency of the leading minds of the other world will yet accomplish for mankind at large. The Utah movement is, we believe, destined to grow into one of the largest centres of Spiritualistic power. It has commenced among a purely inspirational people. A larger number of mediumistic persons in proportion to the population can be found congregated in Utah than in any other part of the world. The doctrine of revelation and angelic intercourse has gathered them together, and for its realization they sigh day by day. It will take but the breaking of their mental bonds to constitute them the most earnest Spiritualistic people of the age. Accustomed to mission the world for the propagation of the doctrine of revelation and inspiration sustained only by the faintest manifestations of spiritual power, we will they not do so in behalf of the same immortal truths when intercommunication with the upper life becomes, as Spiritualism will yet make it, a tangible fact of their every-day lives?

As fast as opportunities offer and wisdom dictates, your best mediums and speakers should come here. A great field for their labors will be found as soon as sufficient openings for their support present themselves.

Not less than fifty thousand dollars having been expended by the Spiritualists of the Utah movement in sustaining a press, holding meetings, and building a large hall, dedicated from its inception to unlimited truth, and performing such missionary labor as has been possible, together with heavy responsibilities constantly upon us, we want us from immediately receiving such aid as we need. The Utah Spiritualists will always welcome their brethren and sisters from any part of the world. With them they testify to the truth of intercommunication with the immortal dead,—the grandest truth of this or any previous age,—a truth which solves the mystery of the past and present, unlocks the future to our anxious gaze, and reveals the grand progress of our common humanity beyond and this side the grave,—opens a portal through which the garnered wisdom of unnumbered ages, and the sweet sentiments of higher planes of life and action can be transmitted to humanity below,—a truth more potent with the human heart, a greater evangelizer of the life, a mightier iconoclast of error, than all other truths put together. In the words of that great truth they greet that vast and ever-increasing army whose destiny it is to lift up the panoply of death which over-hangs the world, and bring life and immortality to light.

Signed on behalf of the Utah Spiritual Movement,
W. S GODBE.
MARY GODBE.
And one hundred and fifty-eight other Spiritualists of Utah.

MICHIGAN.

Report of Grove Meeting held at Grand Ledge, Eaton Co., Sept. 2d and 3d, 1871.

The weather being fine, the Spiritualists of Grand Ledge and vicinity assembled Saturday, at 2 o'clock P. M., in a beautiful grove prepared for the occasion.

Meeting called to order by John Farlin, of Bellevue; after which M. C. Burtch, of Grand Ledge was elected President, and Mrs. Geo. W. Lusk, of Eaton Rapids Secretary.

Next followed the election of committees.

Business Committee.—John Farlin, L. Boller, Jabez Ashley.

Finance Committee.—Porter Skinner, Mrs. Macumber, Mrs. Brown, P. G. Cook, Mrs. Bement.

Committee on Resolutions.—Ira Smith, Dr. Jewett, Mrs. Macumber.

We were then entertained by an address from Dr. Lusk of Eaton Rapids, followed by a Conference Meeting, which was rendered very interesting and instructive by the remarks made and the beautiful harmony which seemed to exist.

Thus closed our afternoon exercises, and we returned to our homes with our minds refreshed and elevated to prepare for the feast on the morrow.

SUNDAY MORNING SESSION.

Meeting commenced at 9 A. M.

Opened by Conference Meeting, in which Dr. Lusk proposed the discussion of the question, "What is Right?" which was participated in by many of the friends present, and added much zeal and interest to the meeting. Professor Bailey and wife then arrived from Charlotte, and entertained us at intervals during the day with vocal and instrumental music.

Mrs. M. J. Kutz, of Rockford, then gave an invocation, after which we listened to a lecture by Dr. Lusk; subject, "Eternal Progression," of which he claims to be a practical representative.

Mrs. Kutz followed with an able address on the same subject.

During this session a collection was taken up and the amount of money readily contributed speaks well for the friends in this vicinity, showing how earnest they are in this great progressive work.

Meeting adjourned until 2 P. M.

During the intermission, a nice basket picnic was served in which all the friends were invited to participate.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

At two o'clock we were again called to order by the President, to enjoy the last of this glorious feast.

Resolutions were read and adopted, but as they were not handed in to the Secretary, we shall be unable to report them for publication. The last one, which pertained to the rights of woman, was followed by an essay from Mrs. Kutz, on the same subject, in which woman's rights were ably advocated, and her proper position placed before us.

Mrs. Edgar, of Lansing, also read a beautiful inspirational essay in which we received some of the pure essence of Spiritual philosophy.

Next followed an address in the German tongue, by Mr. Gansly, of Lansing, and judging from the appearance of the speaker, it must have been very elevating and entertaining to those who understood the German language.

In localities where there are Germans who desire a progressive teacher, they would do well to secure the services of Mr. Gansley, for he is a young man just entering the field, and his heart and hand are engaged in the work.

We next had the pleasure of listening to a very interesting discourse from Mrs. Kutz, telling us how to meet the change called death without a sigh; and enjoy a brighter and better condition on the other side.

Next, an address by Dr. Lusk portraying the beauties of the Summer-Land, which closed the exercises.

It was decided during this meeting to hold the annual meeting of the County Circle at Grand Ledge the first Saturday and Sunday in October. Several of the most able speakers in the State are engaged, and it is hoped that this meeting will increase the strength that Spiritualism has already gained in Eaton County.

May we as a band of progressive Spiritualists concentrate our forces, and freeing ourselves from slavery of every kind live in harmony with the beautiful laws of life.

MRS. GEO. W. LUSK, Secretary.

MEETING AT NORTH COLLINS.

The Sixteenth Annual Meeting of the Friends of Human Progress, at North Collins, N. Y., Friday Morning, Aug. 25th, 1871.

The congregation was called together by music and song.

The auniversary meeting was opened by Mr. Levi Brown, Chairman of the Business Committee.

G. W. Taylor was appointed President, and Sarah S. Tousey Secretary of the meeting.

Bro. Taylor took the stand and addressed a few kind words of greeting to all.

Giles B. Stebbins next addressed the audience. He spoke with enthusiasm of the great influence our meeting had had in the past all over the country. He had heard it mentioned as far west as the Mississippi; east to Cape Cod and Bangor, Maine; and south to Washington. With words of encouragement to those who sustain the meeting, he gave place to Mr. Wm. Lloyd, of Philadelphia, a Quaker, whose soul has been opened to receive these beautiful truths.

In the afternoon the meeting opened with music, followed by remarks from Mr. Lloyd.

Music.

Lecture by Lyman C. Howe. Subject of discourse, "Have faith in one another." He held that this faith should belong to the inner man; that underneath the external manifestations of impurity and crime, there still lives the great divine that sooner or later will come forth. He spoke of the necessity of self control,—"that we should first conquer the evil within our own nature, then strive to conquer others by the same law."

Closed with a beautiful and expressive poem.

After some business arrangements, Mr. G. B. Stebbins made some remarks in regard to the punishment of criminals, saying "that our prisons should be reformatory asylums, under the management of the noblest types of men, and the truest and sweetest developments of womanhood."

The session closed with song,—"True Heroism."

Saturday morning the rain prevented the session expected.

In the afternoon the meeting opened with music.

Business arrangements occupied a few moments, after which Mrs. Watson, of Titusville, was announced. She opened with a beautiful invocation. Subject of discourse, "Divine Motherhood." I will not attempt to give even an outline of the soul-stirring discourse, knowing I could not do it justice. Suffice it to say, no woman could listen without higher, holier aspirations stealing into her soul, and no man without a deeper appreciation of true womanhood.

After a short conference, the meeting adjourned with music from the choir.

Sunday afternoon the session opened by conference, participated in by Messrs. Wm. Lloyd, Giles B. Stebbins and others, Bro. Stebbins reading some of his "Scriptures."

Music by B. A. Beal and Miss Cady,—"Will you Come to Meet me, Darling?"

Adjourned for one hour.

The session re-organized with music, after which a lecture was delivered by Lyman C. Howe. Subject,—"The Lessons of Fatherhood." Taken in connection with Mrs. Watson's discourse on Saturday, nothing could have been more appropriate. He claimed that as in the past the world had gone to one extreme by assigning to man the whole power and responsibility of governing the universe, so reformers of the present day have gone to the opposite extreme by making the mother alone responsible for her offspring, and thus controlling the destinies of nations. He took the intermediate ground, claiming that man and woman are equal, and according to each alike the responsibility and the glory of their achievements.

After a few remarks by Brother Taylor and Mrs. Watson in regard to the discourse, the choir sang a "Thanksgiving Anthem," which was followed by a discourse from Mrs. Watson on "The Science of Spiritualism." The subject was handled in a masterly manner, her arguments striking against the temple of old Theology with such force as to cause her walls to crumble, and rearing in its stead the temple of eternal truth.

By request, Brother Taylor related his experience in Moravia a few weeks since, in so touching a manner as to bring tears to every eye. Among his closing remarks he said "that beliefs and theories were of no value, only as they sank deep into the soul and were manifest in our daily lives."

The meeting closed with music from the choir.

Despite the rain which fell in torrents during the forenoon, and continued in lesser quantity through the day, the hall was filled with attentive listeners.

SARAH S. TOUSEY, Secretary.

OHIO.

Grove Meeting at Cardington.

The meeting on Saturday commenced by B. Mosher going down in the grove and taking his stand on the fence and delivering a short address, which showed that the spirit of Dow (by whom he was controlled) has his peculiarities yet as when in earth-life. Then he came back, took the stand, and made a prayer.

Mrs. P. I. Sargeant then took the stand, and by the aid of angel friends tried to awaken all to the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism.

Mrs. Shaw, of Joliet, Illinois, made a prayer and gave a short address.

Mrs. M. Sargeant, of Marion, Ohio, then spoke words of comfort and consolation to the aged, who were attentive listeners to each and every speaker in the good cause.

Dexter Bates, of Fremont, Ohio, spoke, giving forth words of cheer.

Mrs. Shaw, according to appointment, gave us a lecture; subject: "What Good has Spiritualism done?"

Mrs. Martha Smith and Mrs. M. Sargeant each spoke a few minutes.

Mrs. P. I. Sargeant spoke on the subject: "What will it Profit a Man if he Gain the whole World and Lose that Home made more Beautiful by Every Good Word or Deed done in this Life?"

Mrs. Shaw then closed the meeting until two o'clock in the afternoon.

After feasting so bountifully on spiritual food, each brought forward their basket or box of dinner, as the case might be, and after a cordial greeting of our Ashley brothers and sisters we spread our cold dinner before them, that each and every one might partake of something to supply the physical.

Mrs. Shaw then spoke on practical religion. Then conference meeting; speakers, Mrs. Martha Smith, Mr. Mary A. Smith, Mr. Van Druzen, Mrs. Shaw, Dexter Bates.

SUNDAY MORNING SESSION.

At half past 10 Mrs. Shaw addressed the company on "Natural Religion." After a feast of spiritual food, then came the wants of the physical. We then dined,—not to take up twelve baskets full, as we had the multitude of five thousand did that fed on five loaves and two fishes.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

Lecture by Mrs. Shaw on the undaunted fearlessness of the Spiritualists.

Conference. Speakers, Gardner Emery, Chauncey Essign, of Mt. Gilead, Ohio, Eber Smith, Miles M. Gray, Mrs. P. I. Sargeant, Mrs. M. Sargeant, Mr. Lydia, of Mt. Gilead.

Our meeting was brought to a close earlier than it would otherwise have been, by prospect of a rain which was so much needed here. There was a very large company congregated in the grove to-day, and carriages of almost every description from the Gilead coach and hack down to a big wagon holding ten or twelve persons; and I am pleased to say those in attendance were as quiet and orderly as at any grove meeting I ever attended. It is to be hoped much good was done and many minds stirred anew with the glorious truths there presented.

MISS D. E. SOUTHWICK.

LIFE IN A TOMB.

The Story of James T. Anderson, of Iowa —A Living Head on a Dead Body—Writing and Learning to Paint With His Mouth.

BROTHER JONES:—Having read with interest the views of Dr. Vaderbilt on mesmerism, and of Dr. Fahnestock on somnambulism, as set forth in their books, and in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL from time to time, both of whom I respect as progressive men, and as I can not yet decide which is wrong, "twee-dledee" or "tweedledum," I clip the inclosed from the St. Louis Times, which I think might be a good subject for Bro. Fahnestock to prove the position he takes on self-control. I for one would like to know more of somnambulism before I can give up the belief that my magnetism heals the sick. Names are nothing. We want facts. Is, or is not, Dr. Fahnestock a magnetizer, is the point we wish to get at.

R. D. G.

In Iowa resides James T. Anderson, aged twenty-six. Three years ago he died from his neck downward. His head, however, is alive, and more vigorous and active than before the body which once governed it ceased to be vital. At the age of two years James's father died, and his mother soon married again. At the age of three he was tossed several times by an angry cow. Shortly afterward, while he was eating bread and milk, a rattlesnake joined him, and when the two had finished, his snakeship made his bow and retired. At five years old a horse ran away with him, and made for a stable, across the entrance to which was a bar. The horse rushed under the bar, and his mother seized him just in time to save his life. He grew up active and strong, and was fond of sports. He became a good gymnast.

James, at the time of the accident that left him with a dead body and a living head, was a fine, handsome young man. He weighed two hundred pounds, and there was not a superfluous ounce of flesh on his body.

One afternoon, when on a visit to an uncle at Glenwood, Iowa, he was exercising on a pole placed from one tree to another in a back yard. He had on a pair of gaiters tipped with patent leather. He swung down from the pole by his feet; the leather slipped and he fell. He struck his neck just where it joins the shoulders. He was bewildered but perfectly conscious. His body felt as though smashed to a jelly. He experienced a horrible tingling, and when the doctor came he told him not to touch him, as his body was broken to pieces. His neck was broken; inflammation set in, and all thought his end had come. To the surprise of all, in a few days he began to mend. He was shortly after removed to his step-father's house, where he still resides.

Time hung heavily on his hands, and he resolved to learn to write with his mouth. He accomplished this, and, as he says in a letter to Mr. J. K. Nutting, he soon wrote a tolerable good mouth. He is now trying to paint, and hopes by this means to earn something for his support. He has two, and still is, tenderly cared for by his sister, herself a cripple, and speaks in the highest terms of his stepfather, who, though a poor man, has shown him every kindness.

His worst enemies are the flies, which buzz about his face. He holds a leafy twig in his mouth, however, and manages to twirl it about in a wonderful way and drive off his tormentors. This case is without a parallel, except that of John Carter, of England, who was injured in a similar way, and who became a famous painter.

The New York Riots and the Catholic Church.

We were very much astonished a few days ago by reading an article on the above subject from the pen of our Sister Wilkinson, in which she imputes those riots, solely and entirely to the influence of the Catholic Church, but more particularly to the priests. One would suppose from reading her article, that she is an orthodox preacher, so loudly she raises that old native American cry of "down with the Catholics." We were astonished that the spirit guides of our enlightened Sister, had not long ago taught her that the Catholic Church, like all other churches is itself a result and not the cause of anything. Churches and creeds are the natural development of a certain mental condition; and as men progress they change their characters and creeds. If they have arrived at the highest condition consistent with the then prevalent creeds and churches to progress further, they must originate new creeds and new churches. Thus we find the enlightened end advanced spirits of each age, stepping outside and beyond the orthodoxy of the time, and developing new and unheard of forms of heresy. These new churches and creeds are "Infidelity" until the world comes up to that standard of belief, and enough accept of them to make them respectable, then they are called "orthodoxy," but the world moves on. New creeds spring up,—pass through the fiery trial of "infidelity," "devil," etc., incident to the childhood of all new religious development, and finally become "old fogy"—"the revealed Church of God," etc., etc. Then that which was "Orthodox" passes into the "sere and yellow leaf," and becomes "superstition." Each religious epoch is also marked as a political era; in other words, the mind develops men, and more perfect forms of government as it evolves more refined and higher conceptions of religion and God. We will get further—each religious step higher, and each political step onward, is marked by a corresponding upward and onward march of the soul to higher and nobler conceptions of our moral and social duties and relations. Look about you at the present day upon the nations of the earth; read the pages of history for all past time, and see if this is not true? The Mohammedan countries are absolute monarchies, while all the moral and social virtues are scarcely recognized, and the rights of the poor are not known.

All purely Catholic countries are in a transition state between absolute and constitutional monarchies, while the social virtues, though at a low ebb, are more advanced than in Mohammedan countries. In these, murder, rapine, and lawlessness prevail to an extent that is alarming.

Where a particular Protestant Church is established by law, and all others excluded or obliged to pay heavy tithes, we find a constitutional monarchy, a parliament, a congress, subservient to the will of the people, while it in its turn controls and regulates the monarchy. Where religion is free, and Protestantism prevails in all its manifold phases, we find a republic, with all officers and powers and places at the disposal of the people, or representatives elected by them. We find peace and order prevailing; the rights of the highest and lowest protected, and all classes and conditions allowed to pursue their several vocations unmolested.

Now each of these conditions is the result of the development of the people. A certain condition of humanity produced Mohammedanism in religion, absolutism in politics, and degradation in social economy. At this stage, all is peace, for the same reason that "quiet reigns at Warsaw." A certain higher condition of development produces Catholicism in religion, a transition state in politics and in social ethics. A still higher mental development produces Protestantism in religion, a constitutional monarchy or republican government, and social, or at least political equality before the law.

As well might we claim that the government was the result of the religion as to charge either with being responsible for the social conditions. All are equally the result of mental or spiritual development, and are alike innocent of the sins of the others.

Catholicism does not produce riots any more than riots produce Catholicism; but both are the result of the degree of enlightenment or development. To blame the Catholic church for the New York riots, or any other riots, is as senseless as for Christ to curse the fig tree for not having figs on it in the season when figs could not be expected.

This view of the case teaches us to pity all while we blame none, and admonishes us that if we would not have a repetition of the New York riots, we must educate our people above that degree or grade of development where riots are possible.

SANTONINE.

Young Girl Ruined by a Clergyman in Northern Ohio.

BROTHER JONES:—I inclose herewith an article from a supplement to this morning's Commercial, of this city. I do not send it through any vicious motives toward our Orthodox friends, but as they are so ready to pick up and publish the least frailty on the part of a Spiritualist, I thought the inclosed article (which is not by any means an isolated case) would be a very good thing to have about the house, in case you should need it.

Your very truly,
J. P. HORTON.

Cincinnati, O., Sept. 6 1871.

The Rev. Wm. McElwee, late of Philadelphia, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, founder and Principal of the Bowling Green English and Classical Seminary, at that place, who was arrested on Thursday, and confined in jail, for the seduction of Miss Lambert, was taken out on Friday for trial. When the Prosecuting Attorney decided that under the affidavit he could not make a State case out of it as the young lady was over age. Judge Lynch then undertook to prosecute the case in his peculiar style by procuring a surgeon and assistants, with ropes, etc. Better counsel prevailed, as he was given a few hours to take his departure. The reverend scoundrel had the impudence then to ask leave to remain over the Sabbath and preach to his congregation, saying he could explain the matter. Judge Lynch again "put in," and he was promised a new suit of clothes all of one pattern and style, and a primitive horse to ride, led by four assistants. He concluded he had better make his exit on short notice, and took the back for the railroad amid the jeers of the crowd and the tolling of the bell.

This Rev. "late from Philadelphia," "took up" a select school last winter, in Bowling Green, consisting of [illegible] scholars, and gave it the high [illegible] at the head of this letter. This [illegible]y was one of his scholars, and they [illegible] home and went to his house (being a man of family, wife and three children) to recite, and this girl had one or two studies (singly) that made recitations private, and it was during the term of this school that he brought her under his evil influence and accomplished his hellish designs. She was sent to Galesburg, Illinois, instead of Toledo, and among letters that she has brought back, is one from him containing a prescription which he wished her to take, and she went to a druggist to have it filled, and the druggist refused to fill it, saying that if taken it would kill her. The only thing the people of Bowling Green are censurable for is letting him go away without punishment, and we have therefore tried to give him a good notice.

Letter from Ell F. Brown.

BROTHER JONES:—We have been at this place—Richmond township, Crawford Co, Pennsylvania—for the last three weeks, helping the earnest people here to place their lyceum upon a permanent plan of operation. We find here a beautiful little hall, built by the friends, something over a year ago. The members of the society are scattered over a rural district of some eight or ten miles square. They are in earnest in their efforts to make their neighbors acquainted with the good things of which they have a knowledge, and their endeavors to build up a lyceum for the benefit of the children have been quite successful. Although these people have to come miles to meeting and lyceum, their attendance is prompt. Their lyceum exercises are without any of the equipments except manuals and Lyceum Banners, yet we find as much interest among the children and older folks as we have ever met with in any other place.

The society known as the Progressive Spiritualists held their annual meeting during the first three days of September. Bro. Lyman C. Howe was the principal speaker. Brother Lunt, of Corry, gave us many beautiful poems. The meeting was largely attended, and was of much interest. What these people here in this country district are accomplishing for Spiritualism, and for their children through the lyceum, is sufficient to encourage our liberal friends every where to keep to the work.

The JOURNAL is taken extensively through this district of country, and is highly valued. We go to Springfield, Ohio, as our next field of labor.

Lilac Hollow, Penn, Sept. 6, 1871.

—P. T. Barnum is building a large library to connect with his beautiful residence, "Waldermere," at Bridgeport. When he gets it finished he will have to purchase a lot of books to fill it, which reminds the New York Globe that Josh Billings says a Newfoundland dog is a good thing to have, only one must get one or two children and a pond before he will be of any use.

—Women have their rights in Madrid, where Rose Campos and Rose Gurtrez were advertised to kill the bull at a recent Sunday bullfight.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.
A MANUAL OF
SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY
By Hudson Tuttle.
WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. Price $2.00; Postage 16c.
This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.
Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.
While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is making the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every man's door.
. Price, $2.00; postage, 24 cents. For sale, wholesale and retail, by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 S. Clark St., Chicago.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE,
A Book for the Age and the Times,
and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.
You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet in argruments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.
It discusses the matter of Bible canons, versions, translations and revisions with ability, citing none but authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.
The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley
It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.
The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for nearly the whole of the first edition before it was published, one party alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.

THE Science of Evil;
OR
FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION.
BY JOEL MOODY.
THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION, and clearly shows that without Evil there can be neither Morals, Science, Knowledge, or Human Action on earth. In fact, without Evil, man could not exist. The work fully solves the PROBLEM, and unveils the mystery of Evil, giving it a scientific meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES THE MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD,
The book is a large 12 mo., of 342 pages, printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy paper. Price, $1,75; postage, 20 cents.

MEDIUM'S DIRECTORY.

[PUBLISHED EVERY OTHER WEEK.]

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an agency friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so far forget their self respect as to speak evil of other mediums, and unhappily a class of those who are by their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register so soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulging in such unkindness.

It should be borne in mind that spiritualists visiting mediums carry conditions with themselves—so to speak—which aid or destroy the power of spirits to control the medium visited; hence in that one medium gives satisfaction to certain persons, another better to others—all having their friends, and justly so, too, and all equally honest and useful in their places.

Health by Good Living.
BY W. W. HALL, M. D.,
Editor of Hall's "Journal of Health."
THIS book is to show how high health can be maintained and common diseases cured by "good living," which means eating with a relish the best food, prepared in the best manner.
The best food includes meats, fish, poultry, wild game fruits, and the grains which make bread.
The best cookery preserves the natural tastes and juices. As there can be no "good living" without a good appetite, how to get this great blessing without money and without price, is pointed out, and, it is hoped, in very clear and plain terms.
Some of the subjects treated are:—
The object of eating: Power to work: Early breakfast: Dinner-time: Luncheon: Eating "down town:" What shall a man do? What shall fat men eat? How to get rid of bad blood: Diet for the sick: Spring diseases: Children's eating: Forcing children to eat: Young ladies' nature: Cold feet and headache: Biliousness: A lazy liver: Mischievous books: The out-door air: Why are we dispeptic? Discomfort after eating: Oats as a: Certain cure of neuralgia:

How to avoid [illegible]: And all those without medicine: without money; without price, and without end.
It tells about
Luncheons and how to take them: Late dinners and how to take them: How drunkards are made at eating-houses: How girls are spoiled at boarding-schools: How health is lost: How home is lost: How novel-reading ruins them: How love of dress is instilled: How young men are talked about: How bad matches are made: How good wives are made at home: How home influence purifys.

The Bible in India.
HINDOO ORIGIN OF
Hebrew and Christian Revelation.
TRANSLATED FROM
"LA BIBLE DANS L' INDE."
BY LOUIS JACOLLIOT.
EXTRACTS FROM AUTHOR'S PREFACE:
"I come to show you humanity, after attaining the loftiest regions of speculative philosophy, of untrammeled reason on the venerable soil of India, was trammeled and stifled by the altar that substituted for intellectual life a semi-brute existence of dreaming impotence.....
India is the world's cradle; hence it is that the common mother in sending forth her children even to the utmost west has, in unfading testimony of our origin, bequeathed us the legacy of her language, her laws, her morals, her literature, and her religion.....
To religious fanaticism, impotent, peculiarly religious, and class-legislation, may be attributed the decay of nations.....
.....Aware of the resentment I am provoking, I yet shrink not from the encounter.....We are no longer burnt at the stake."

TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Order, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.00 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

We cannot recognize as the subscriber without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the coming year, with or without further reminder from this office

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

[redacted] 10th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—10 Dec.—0." The 0 means 1871. If he has only paid to Dec. 10th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—10 Dec.—9, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as '70 for 1870, or '69 for 1869.

☞Transmitting money to this office for the JOURNAL should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

A God Found as Defined by Some—Dyspeptical Minds—The Universal Soul—The Various Bodies, How Sustained.

NUMBER LVIII.

Catching a glimpse of the morning sun as it rises, always inspires us with poetical feelings, for there is a grandeur connected therewith that is truly sublime. Seeing the scintillating rays of the solution of this question before us, not far distant, we feel that we are favored. For one year we have patiently labored, presenting the views of a spirit who has long resided in the Summer Land, having no idea whatever as to the conclusion that he would come to. Having confidence in his ability, we have patiently submitted to have our brain used for the transmission of his thoughts, and we have learned lessons of wisdom therefrom. Spirits are our teachers,—especially those who have been long in spirit life, and who have made any particular subject an especial study. In the discussion of this question, we have presented many ideas that were eminently well calculated to arouse the people, for whenever the iconoclastic hammer is used, the sound that it creates is calculated to excite alarm in the mind, for it does not know that any fabric can be erected in the place of that demolished. Really, there is no reason whatever that alarm should be aroused in any mind. He who fears the result of reasoning on his own mental calibre, should avoid all iconoclastic thoughts. There are dyspeptical minds as well as dyspeptical stomachs—such should pursue thoughts that are not too iconoclastic or new, for they are sure to awaken the sensibilities of their overtaxed organ, and pain and fear are at once excited. We understand human nature. We have traversed the fields of the past; gazed upon the result that follows traditionary teachings, and examined carefully the moral status of nations in older times, and we have invariably found that all innovations on established customs, have created alarm—the greater the error, or more monstrous the absurdity, the more fearful and alarming is the tumult that follows. The human mind of today is not much easier of access than a thousand years ago. Truths do not reach it much sooner now, or any more forcibly, than then, and the probability is, the time will never arrive on this earth when all innovations in old established usages do not excite alarm on the part of some one.

The world says, find that which possesses,
1st, All power,
2nd, Omniscience,
3rd, And is omnipresent, and you a have God which the world will be compelled to recognize. Here is what expresses those attributes.

1.—The sum total of all things that manifest power, is all power,—one of the attributes of God.

2.—The sum total of all things that possess or manifest wisdom or intelligence, is omniscience, the second attribute of God.

3.—All things combined, existing throughout the universe, and taken as one grand whole, express this quality of God,—omnipresence.

We defy the world, the scientist, the philosopher, the profound thinker, to find the attributes of a God, as defined, outside of that which we have mentioned above. But is not this a strange condition of things—one part of your God acting upon another part; one part of your God elevating and sustaining another part?

As there is a soul or life principle to each physical organization that animates it to action, so there is a soul or life principle to the universe, and its action is manifested in the innumerable laws of the material world. That soul or life principle of the universe manifests power in all things only in the quickening, animating influences that it exerts. Its laws are subservient to man, and man is subservient to them. They are beautifully interlinked. The universal soul presents the laws; and man combines their action, and does many marvelous things. Man is not only subservient to law, but is co-equal with law. The individualized soul with its laws, is as old as the universal soul with its laws. There is no sovereign of the universe, save only in this sense, that man is subject to its laws. It is non-compliance with the laws and impulses of this universal soul, that causes suffering. But this universal soul is not your God! Why? For it does not possess all power in the sense in which you use the term,—one of his attributes. But is it not a meaningless term then to apply the name God at all? It may be, but the world has seen fit to declare that God is omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent, and that which possesses these qualities, we have found. Then have we not found what you have designated as God? It can not be otherwise! Again, if there is a God outside of that which we have enumerated above, he can not be all-powerful, for the moment you detach a single being from him, there is a power outside of him, and he is not all-powerful! Hence in a moment is destroyed.

This universal soul is in one sense a God! It is the animating influence permeating all things, and may be regarded as the law of mind, spirit and matter. It acts through the instrumentality of individualized intelligences, in numberless ways. It is omnipresent in its laws, is deaf and blind, yet between it and man there is a reciprocal action.

The universal soul,—what is it? There is infinite space; but what of that? Does it not teach a lesson? Yes, and a grand one, too. Absolute vacancy,—is that a possibility? What is nothing? Do not mention it, for it is a meaningless term. Space exists within this room. Within that space are the elements of life! The elements of life are within us—all about us.

There is life within us, and that must be sustained by life without. In the air we breathe, the food we eat, and the water we drink are life-principles which sustain and nourish the body.

Supposing eight spheres connected with this planet, the earth being one in which we now reside, there is an outer covering that corresponds exactly with the sphere in which you live. Before you can ascend higher the spirit must be divested of that. So on earth you have seven outer organisms of which the spirit must be divested before it can be allowed to enter the eighth plane, or the seventh sphere of the Spirit World. The physical organism of earth affords nourishment to each interior covering of the spirit, the life-principle becoming more refined as it passes through each organism until it reaches the mind or soul, where it simply becomes a quickening influence. The physical body cannot be nourished with the elements of the first sphere in spirit life, but the physical body here, through its internal action, affords nourishment to the body of the second sphere. While here, you have all the outer coverings of the spirit that you will ever have. On ascending to each sphere in the Spirit World, this outer covering must be left with that sphere to which it corresponds in material. Study my position carefully. Each of these bodies requires nourishment while on earth, and each is in constant action. The more perfect the body, the more healthful in action, the more perfect each of the interior bodies, for it is from the extreme outer covering that each one is enabled to receive nourishment. Again, these bodies act simultaneously, and the influence that each exerts on the succeeding interior body, is more refined in its nature and influence until when it reaches the soul it partakes somewhat of the nature of the universal soul.

1st body, similar to earth.
2d body, similar to material of 1st spirit sphere.
3d body, similar to material of 2d spirit sphere.
4th body, similar to material of 3d spirit sphere.
5th body, sim lar to material of 4th spirit sphere.
6th body, similar to material of 5th spirit sphere.
7th body, similar to material of 6th spirit sphere.
8th body, similar to material of 7th spirit sphere.

While on earth, you possess all of these bodies, and they require nourishment, and receive it always through the instrumentality of the extreme outer physical organization. You can see here why man is regarded as an epitome or microcosm of the universe. He has all the elements within him of the various spheres. We sometimes speak of these outer coverings as physical organisms, for they only become visible to each one as they throw off the next outer covering.

The universal soul can only communicate with the interior soul of man, only through the medium of all these outer bodies. When a certain sphere of existence or condition is attained, you are then brought in contact with it direct, and are in rapport, in one sense, with a God—this Universal Soul. Millions of years, yes, quintillions of years, may pass before this can be fully realized.

Quarterly Meeting.

Brother B. R. Young informs us that the Spiritualists will hold a Quarterly Meeting at Rockford, October 7th, commencing at one o'clock. Prof. S. Whipple and wife are the speakers.

Mediums and Seances in Chicago.

During the last week Spiritualism has been above par in Chicago. There has been an unusual demand for the services of good mediums. The session of the Grand Lodge of the U. S. of I. O. O. F., has brought to the city many prominent gentlemen from the different States and Territories, as well as from the different Provinces of the British Dominion, and we are glad to be enabled to announce to our readers that many of that honorable order are Spiritualists. Indeed our Reception Rooms were thronged with friends during the week—all anxious to witness the various phases of spirit manifestations as displayed through different media. We have pretty good evidence that all the mediums of the city were well patronized.

Mrs. Maud Lord held several seances which were well attended. The one she held at Mrs. A. H. Robinson's, 148 Fourth Avenue, was attended by a select party of gentlemen and ladies—about forty in number. It was one of the finest seances ever given by that most excellent medium.

She first gave a cabinet seance, being tied by a committee consisting of two lake captains, who were not only skeptics, but knew how to handle the ropes so as to hold fast.

No sooner was the cabinet door closed upon Mrs. Lord than fast tied with her hands behind her, so that she could not move them, than hands were thrust out of the cabinet window, in plain view of the audience assembled, when as quick as thought the door of the cabinet was thrown open, and naught was to be seen but Mrs. Lord tied as when the door was closed upon her! Large hands and small hands, were presented one after another.

Various faces, some of youths, and some of old persons, some with gray beards and hair, and some with smooth-shaven faces, excepting a black moustache. A variety of faces and busts as low as the waist were frequently exhibited.

Conditions to guard against fraud and deception were so perfect as to leave the minds of each investigator free from the least suspicion of any trick or deception on the part of the medium.

After one hour and a half had thus been spent in the cabinet exhibition, a dark seance was arranged. Owing to the large number of persons present, there being enough for three seances, that number of sittings were given.

These seances were of the same satisfactory character,—every person present having several angel visitors, who, from little children to aged and loving parents, were able to make themselves known, in a most unmistakable manner. Indeed it was one of the finest seances ever held in the city. On the evening previous, a young gentleman, by the name of Choate, held a seance at the same place, which was well attended by gentlemen and ladies, resident and from abroad.

Mr. Choate is a young medium, recently from Boston. He, while entranced by an Indian spirit answering to the name of Monico, and who says he belongs to the Chippewa tribe, will describe spirits—relations and friends of gentlemen and ladies attending his seances, minutely and perfectly. He not only describes their persons as they are now in spirit life, but he will describe them as they were in this life; describe the last clothing they wore—the manner of their death—their burial apparel and the coffin, casket, case, or whatever the manner of their burial may have been. He is an excellent test medium of the phase above referred to. He is also a fine speaker, and lectures before public audiences.

He will remain in the city for a short time. During his stay he will make engagements to meet small, private parties or single individuals for seances. He can be found or addressed at the Reception Rooms of this Publishing House.

The Bangs children will soon commence holding seances again. They are most extraordinary mediums, and we expect to be able to make new announcements in regard to them in a short time.

Mrs. A. H. Robinson continues to give private sittings for diagnosing and prescribing for disease, and business purposes. Her wonderful powers as a medium are widely known from practical observation. She is not only a lady of refinement, but of remarkable mediumistic power in treating thousands of sick people in various parts of the country, without ever seeing them, diagnosing most perfectly, and prescribing most certain curative remedies, by simply holding a lock of the sick person's hair in her hand. Numerous letters from persons thus treated and cured, are received by her every day.

We select from a large package which have been placed before us, at random, the following:

Mrs. A. H. Robinson:—Having noticed your advertisement in the Journal, I take the opportunity of sending to you for a prescription for my wife. She will be sixty years old the 13th November next. She has been troubled with a "derangement of the liver and kidneys," as the doctors say, for I number of years. She was attacked with paralysis five or six years. She went to Dr. Newton at Toledo, and received much benefit by his laying on of hands and other treatment. She took a bad cough last winter, and has been troubled with cramping and pains in the same side ever since. I, therefore, send you a lock of her hair and the fee,—$2.00,—hoping that you will, by "the powers that be," be enabled to discover her maladies and disease better than I can describe.

Please send delineation of her disease. Her name is Margaret Elmer.

PHILO ELMER.

Lodi, Ohio, July 21st, 1871

Mrs. Robinson diagnosed and prescribed, and the following is the result:

Mrs. A. H. Robinson—Dear Sister:—The prescription that you sent me for my wife has worked like a charm, doing her great benefit.

Now, I wish you to send a prescription for my son, who is troubled with rheumatism and heart-disease at times very bad, so that he can not sleep or rest. He is thirty years old last April; has been afflicted four or five years, getting worse, with pain in the left hip and side. I send you your fee according to terms.

PHILO ELMER.

Lodi, Ohio, Sept 5th, 1871.

SPIRIT ARTISTS.

Mr. Rose and his partner, at 362 State St., are making fine progress in their development as spirit artists. They follow implicitly the directions of their spirit guides, and the results have been most surprising. They do not wish us to give the details of results at present. Suffice it to say, that occasionally they get a spirit likeness as perfect as if they were taken from them while yet in the form. We hope to be able to give details in a short time.

Mr. Rose is also a medium for remarkable physical manifestations. While secured with ordinary handcuffs, his coat will be removed, and another person's coat will be placed upon him, and many other similar feats are performed in his presence like those in the presence of other physical mediums.

There are a great number of other most excellent healing, test, and business mediums in the city, who are doing work most convincing of spirit agency in their several departments of mediumship, many of whose names will be found in the Medium's Register in this paper. We are happy to register the names of all mediums who comply with the simple and just requirements mentioned at the head of that Register. Brief statements of new phases of development in mediumship are also published with pleasure when furnished us for that purpose.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal is the fearless exponent of Spiritualism in all of its phases of development of spirit power. It asks no odds of its opposers, no matter what may be the combinations. It tells the truth at all times when it speaks upon any subject, and when necessary to expose a sham or probe a corrupt and rotten sore,—however disguised,—it will do it most effectually, be it found among the truly evangelical or the hypocritical pretenders of greater morality than the mass of Spiritualists. Such hypocrites are cheats, who have made a record which they cannot efface.

Ministering Angels.

The New York Independent is somewhat inclined to inculcate liberal notions, yet in order to retain the patronage of certain conservatives it is compelled to allow a vein of orthodoxy to bubble and scintillate on its pages. Its last herculean effort to please its conservative friends, appeared Sept. 7th, and consisted of a wood-engraving, beneath which was the following inscription: "Ministering Angels." Notwithstanding the fact that the design of the engraver was to illustrate certain features of old theology, there is a vein of Spiritualism permeating the Independent's description of it that can be plainly discerned. It is as follows:

MINISTERING ANGELS.

That there is an order of beings superior to man, who feel a deep interest in his welfare, is a doctrine which appears quite evident in various parts of Divine Revelation. These beings are called angels; a word in the Hebrew and Greek languages—from which it is derived—signifying a messenger. That there are different gradations in rank and intelligence appears to be set forth by terms applied to the angelic hosts; such as thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers.—Col. 1:16. The ancient Jews reckoned four leaders or companies of angels, each headed by an archangel; the first order being that of Michael, the second of Gabriel, the third of Uriel, and the fourth of Raphael.

Of the creation of man it is stated, in Heb. ii, 7, that he was but a little lower than the angels; and the idea has prevailed in most nations that he has in some manner been connected with them. Their principal employment, however, was to wait upon and minister to the heirs of salvation. It has also been a generally prevalent and very ancient opinion that certain classes of angels were appointed to watch over the welfare of the human race, and that every individual had some spirit or angel, either good or bad, who had control over his mind to a greater or less degree.

It is well known that something like the above belief prevailed among the Jews, Greeks, Romans, and Persians; and, indeed, among many of the barbarous nations of antiquity. Hesiod, one of the most ancient of the Greek poets, tells us in some of his writings that "the men of the golden age are the benign and favorable demons of the present degenerate race; they watch over us, protect us from harm, and strive to the utmost of their power to purify our hearts and save us from misery." Socrates, called the wisest of the heathen philosophers, publicly avowed himself under the guidance of a good genius or spirit, very much in accordance with the Christian idea of a guardian angel.

Angels are first spoken of in the book of Genesis, where two of them appeared for the deliverance of righteous Lot, who dwelt in Sodom, from the fate which overwhelmed the cities of the plain for their wickedness. There are also many other accounts in the Old Testament of the appearance of angels among men—sometimes for the deliverance of his chosen people, and at other times for the destruction of their enemies.

In the New Testament an angel announced the advent of the Savior, and a multitude of the heavenly host were heard praising God for the glad tidings of salvation for fallen men.

Having assumed the nature of man, the Redeemer became subject to his trials and temptations. After successfully resisting the temptation of the Devil, angels came and ministered unto him. In his agony and bloody sweat in the Garden of Gethsemane there appeared an angel from heaven, strengthening him. At his ascension angels were in attendance, and at the day of judgment all the holy angels will be with him.

THE ENGRAVING

is designed to illustrate the nature of the assistance the Christian receives from ministering or guardian angels, in his upward course toward the Heavenly City. In the foreground one is seen about to commence the Christian journey. At first he is moved by the fear of the fatal consequences of continuing in sin. He feels it, like a heavy burden, weighing him down, and would fain fly to the city of refuge. He has heard of the New Jerusalem above, and wishes to be directed into the path which leads to that place of heavenly rest. A ministering or guardian angel now comes to his assistance. He takes his hand, and leads him upward from the dark and miry regions where he has been travers ing, and places his feet on a rock, on the Highway of Holiness—the path seen in the central part of the engraving—which leads to the Heavenly City. —Isa. xxxv, 8.

On the right another traveler has taken up his cross, and is seated to the highway by a ministering spirit. Above them angels are seen carrying Lazarus into Abraham's bosom. A pilgrim, somewhat on the left, has fallen from the highway, and, like David of old, calls upon God for help.—Psa. xviii, 16. The Lord sends from above, and he is drawn out from many waters.—Psa. xviii, 16. His feet are set upon a rock, and his goings are established. As long as the pilgrims continue on the highway they are safe. Though lions may roar and roam around, though hateful serpents hiss, no ravenous beast, nor nothing unclean, shall pass over their pathway.—Isa. xxxv, 9. Guardian angels, as seen in the engraving, stand ready to aid every foe.—Psa. xxxiv, 7.

In the upward distance is seen the River, or Jordan of Death, through which the pilgrim is to pass before he can enter the Heavenly City, his promised inheritance. Two of the pilgrims are seen about to enter the river. Some have passed over to the other side of Jordan, and are conducted into the New Jerusalem, the Paradise of God, where many mansions are prepared for the righteous. The river of the water of life is there; the tree of life is there, the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations. God himself shall dwell with them, and shall wipe all tears away.

Our description of the illustration would differ somewhat from the above. In the foreground is an individual that resembles in every particular a German pedler with a large pack of thread, needles, diaper-pins, Yankee notions etc, on his back, which he evidently proposes to dispose of to the public. While journeying along, meditating on the uncertainty of a pedler's life, he carelessly steps in a mud-hole, and fastened there by its cohesive attraction, he languishingly cries for assistance. A lady, or what is represented as a guardian angel, comes forward to assist him; she resembles a pretty waiter in a lager-beer saloon, and taking him by the hand, she points him to a grove in the New Jerusalem, where he, no doubt, anticipates finding a lager-beer garden with a band of music and other social enjoyments.

On the left of the engraving are two angels, one apparently male, the other female, the former with a spear, the latter with a sword, with which they are fighting the serpent, who is in a burning hell of fire and brimstone. He stands near a withered tree. Here the artist had a fit of abstraction, commonly designated as absent-mindedness, or he never would have represented that tree as standing in a molten mass.

The "Highway of Holiness," which the pure in heart and the righteous are supposed to travel, resembles in appearance old Clark street before it was macadamized, and when it was necessary to place sign-boards over mud-holes with the inscription: "No bottom here." The side of the road next the hill is very jagged, as if the fire had made deep inroads there, while on the other side it is perfectly smooth. Three angels are represented as carrying the half-starved, long, lean, lank Lazarus to Abraham's bosom. Here the artist or the designer made another serious blunder, for he represents one of the heavenly visitants as holding one of his legs in such a position that it must cause great pain and inconvenience to Lazarus. Then just think of assigning a female angel to hold his heels, and a male angel his head! What a want of courtesy or respect for Lazarus,—and how he must have yearned to have her hands resting gently on his forehead, or to bury his face in her golden tresses.

The Heavenly City, or New Jerusalem, toward which the devoted pilgrims are tending, has numerous buildings resembling in appearance the old Chicago Court House or the City Armory. They look dingy, God-forsaken, and seem admirably adapted for the home of the owl and the rat.

Just at the end of the "Highway of Holiness" is the "River of Death." It bears some resemblance to Chicago River when it had no current, and at the time when all the debris and offal of the city were absorbed by it. That "River of Death" is a failure. We would no more think of passing through its turbid waters than we would of being baptised in one of the sewers of this city.

On the other side of this river is a vehicle, looking very much like an emigrant wagon, and to which there seems to be attached six asses. Here is another failure, for the ears of these animals are half as long as their body, when one-tenth would have answered the purpose exactly. On a careful examination, however, of this emigrant wagon and its asses, by the "Universal Household Microscope," the asses, to our astonishment, seemed to turn into angels, and why they should appear like a full-fledged orthodox angel beneath the microscope, and to the natural eye like the aforesaid domestic animal, is beyond our comprehension. It is one of the mysteries of godliness. Then again, one old gentleman who was about to enter the "Highway of Holiness," was represented as carrying a cross, which consisted of a rough plank, sixteen feet long and two feet wide, calculated from the scale of inches adopted by the artist. The cross itself would render any pilgrim weary, whether traveling the "Highway of Holiness," or on the rough stones of Dearborn street. In the New Jerusalem, the engraver represents each building with a tall steeple, but fails to designate the one that God resides in. Had that been, any further Search for God would have been unnecessary. Taken altogether, the effort of the Independent to illustrate certain features of life and characteristics of the spirit world, was a miserable failure, and draws as largely on the imagination as the wonderful adventures and hair-breadth escapes of Sindbad the Sailor.

M. J. King.

We are deeply pained to learn that our old acquaintance and co-worker, M. J. King of Joliet, was instantly killed on Wednesday, the 20th inst., while at work in his planing mill. Bro. King was about sixty years of age. He has been for the last ten years, a very active and efficient working Spiritualist. Having graduated from the orthodox ranks, he was well prepared to fight them, and few of his old orthodox associates, dare brave an intellectual contest with him. While the manner of his departure for the higher life, is to us shocking, we have the satisfaction of knowing that he suffered no physical pain, that he was well prepared to meet his friends, and assume his duties on the other side, and that he will still continue as heretofore to aid his friends in passing from the darkness of old theology into the beautiful light, developed by a knowledge of the Philosophy of Life.

—Oh, how I've suffered with my head! All on account of using the poisonous hair preparations. I now use Nature's Hair Restorative, and it has removed the poison and restored my hair to its former vigor. See advertisement.

Obituary.

Our well-beloved brother, A. B. Whiting, a medium for spirit communion of extraordinary powers, and widely known among Spiritualists throughout the country, departed this life on the 4th inst., at Albion, Michigan, after a protracted illness of several weeks.

Bro. Whiting was developed as a spirit medium at an early age, and has since that time been subject to the trance control of several very eminently wise spirits. Through his organism they have on hundreds of occasions given the world burning thoughts; truthfully portraying the destiny of the human race,—pointing out the true pathway that leads onward and upward to the courts of immortal bliss.

While thus inspired by the angels, his soul was frequently all aglow with spiritual rhapsody that reached the inmost hearts of his auditors, firing them with a zeal that always induced a pentecostal season, only paralleled in the apostolic age.

Bro. Whiting has done his work well. Thousands of loving friends, who have often heard him lecture, and who remain behind him for a longer or shorter period, in this life, will cherish his memory with gratitude. Many who had passed the portals to the higher life in advance of him were awaiting his arrival with love's holiest and best gift—a true, fraternal welcome to the joys of the supernal sphere to which they have attained.

It is well. Change is common to all things, and the pathway of eternal progression is ever upward. Our brother is an arisen spirit. As other spirits communed with mortals through his mediumship, so he in turn will commune with us through media. Seek and ye shall find, ask and ye shall receive words of fraternal love and promise of future joys, even from him who died and yet liveth.

New York Politicians.

The people of New York City have been inflicted with a set of city politicians so corrupt as to shake the commercial basis of the city to its very centre. In two years' time, by downright stealing, they have raised the public debt of that city from $37,000,000 to $200,000,000. A discharged clerk from the Comptroller's office furnished the New York Times with such facts and figures as to warrant that paper in making a direct charge of stealing against all of the prominent city officials. Mayor Hall requested Comptroller Connolly to resign, indirectly charging him as being the criminal. The Comptroller refuses to comply, and says Hall has been overseer to all his acts, and if he is a rascal, Hall is a greater. Connolly at length appoints a deputy, but Mayor Hall refuses to recognize him.

A grand mass meeting of the citizens was called to take some action in this matter, the result of which was the appointment of a committee of seventy to investigate the accounts of the different officer. They have been at work for some time, trying to throw more light upon the matter. The reports, as made thus far, show that the "Tammany ring" has been steeped in political corruption, but they have at length overshot their mark, and the people have now become aroused to a full sense of the rottenness which has so long existed in their midst. New York politics are in need of a thorough purging, and nothing but a bitter pill like this recently unroofed hot-bed of vice could accomplish the desired result.

Personal and Local.

—H. G. Stevens, of Dunleith, has our thanks for list of subscribers.

—Eliza Sellon, of Cuba, Mo., writes us that a good lecturer or test medium would find a field of labor in Cuba, as they have quite a large liberal element and have never been favored with a lecture or seance. Here is a good field for pioneer or missionary labor.

—We are informed by W. Harrol, of Houston, Texas, that Spiritualism is gradually gaining ground in that section of country. The most respectable portion of the community are among its adherents —David S. Fuller, writing from Davenport, Iowa, September 17th, says: "Will you please publish this notice for the benefit of A. H. Davis, of McGregor, Iowa? About two months ago he lost off the steamer Dubeque, an oil cloth satchel containing some valuable things. He requested me to try and find them for him; so, through the art of somnambulism I found them, and await his orders in regard to them. I have written him at McGregor, Iowa, but do not hear from him."

—F. B. Dowd, the Rosicrucian, has settled at Wellsville, Mo. He has just finished an extensive lecturing tour through Iowa. He is spoken of very highly by the friends where he has been visiting.

—Dr. Tombockes is at Lancaster, Penn., receiving instructions in the statuvolic art from Dr. Fahnestock, and has deferred his visit to Europe one week in consequence.

—Dr. C. C. Brackett has been lecturing through Kansas and Nebraska, and reports Spiritualism looking very brightly in those places. He proposes to visit Richmond, Ind., next, and offers to lecture anywhere for the friends if they will furnish him a hall and expenses. Address him immediately at Lincoln, Ill.

—J. W. Evelth, writing from Centralia, Ills., Sept. 16, says: "If a reliable test medium could spend three months in Centralia this winter, people would come out of the woods of old theology by hundreds. I bespeak a good field of labor here for a reliable test medium during the coming winter, and I feel every assurance that one would be amply rewarded."

—The deficit of the shantimonious cashier, Rogers, of the Pejepscot bank, at Brunswick, Me., is $48,000—within $7 000 of the entire capital of the bank. If they had given him another week, he would have cleaned it out altogether.

—Miss Sarah Brown, of Charleston, having experienced a change of heart, sought communion with the people of God, and took an outfit in which to be baptized. She got into the church and jail in one day by this simple single process.

[NUMBER VI]

We have already referred to this subject, and shown that there are two sources of power for this, self healing, under the proper action of the will, and the influence which we receive from those whose vital forces blend when with ours.

We have a friend who is in delicate health, and who is often made to suffer intensely, and receive violent shocks from fright, from slight noises, and from many ordinary events which it is almost impossible to avoid. A short time since she saw a child fall on the ground and hurt itself. She almost fainted, and suffered for days, probably an hundred fold more than the child did.

We asked the question, "Is it your body or your spirit that is thus susceptible, and causes you so much suffering?"

In response we received the following answer:

The physical body is built up by the soul, through the action of the spiritual body. The central soul itself, the immortal spark, is not subject to pain or suffering; the only thing that can befall it is to be retarded in its course. This spiritual, physical body, which is the body of the soul, when it leaves the external form either in sleep, trance, or permanently, at the change called death, draws around it in the earth-life, certain elements of external matter, and thus forms the best body it can.

When inherited conditions and favorable surroundings are furnished, the external body is so formed that it works harmoniously with the interior, and health must be the result. The more perfect the exterior, the better can the interior control it. Wherever, from impure air, imperfect material elements, or inherited diseases, or tendencies to such, the former is diseased, the latter has not been able to do its work properly, and the connection between the two is such that pain and suffering must ensue. Spasmodic action will occur as the interior body attempts to control the exterior.

These sudden shocks are a common experience of every nervous person. They occur frequently when persons are passing into sleep, in which case, the interior body is seeking to escape from its prison house, the physical body, temporarily, so that both may recuperate. In the return of the spiritual body, or waking, there may be similar spasmodic action. Convulsions are produced by the disturbance of the relations between these bodies. All pain results from this cause,—the inability of the spiritual body to act harmoniously upon the external body, or some portions of it.

Herein lies a most important lesson in the treatment of disease. The maxim that "a sick body, like a broken limb, needs rest," is true, but the question is, how shall the rest be obtained?

It is as useless to tell a person to be still and rest, as it was for old Canute to say to the waves, "Thus far shalt thou go." There is something soothing in the presence of certain individuals, and many a nervous and sensitive invalid finds rest and sleep from the mere presence and influence of these. Certain conditions of the body favor rest, and intelligent individuals should note these.

We believe that the culture of the will, so as to enable its proper action, to hold its proper relation to the physical body, is the true means of obtaining health, and this is the proper course to pursue. Of course the culture can be much better carried on in health, than when disease and pain rack the system. Our friends are now learning to discover the peculiar actions by which the relations of these two bodies are governed, and while we avoid every cause which disturbs this relation, we should carefully study and be ever on the watch, that we use the power to develop it. We should practice the use of the will on the various parts of the body. The effort to produce pain in any locality may be useful, because it is by the same power that it is to be removed.

In the practice of statuvolence, each individual should learn to depend upon themselves. One of the greatest curses in the world is the idea that we are to depend upon others to save us in any department of life, either spiritually or physically. If we are ever saved, either in this world or the next, from ignorance and error, it will be through "the grace of God, which bringeth salvation," that is knowledge which we are enabled to obtain of and for ourselves, and of these wonderful structures, which, in the divine economy, we have been enabled to produce.

The man or woman who is most thoroughly acquainted with the laws of life, and who has lived up to this knowledge of these conscientiously and truly, will be able to build up the most beautiful and healthful bodies, working in perfect harmoniously and orderly under the influence of a most beautiful spiritual physical body which is an appropriate covering for the soul,—the immortal spark that is the great centre of all that allied man to God, and makes him all that he is above the brutes.

The relation between these two bodies will alone explain mediumship in all its various phases. There is a partial influence in the rapping mediums, and the spirit directing the phenomena so as to convey intelligence, uses the forces generated in the physical body, and according to the extent of these forces and the degree in which the control of them is obtained, is the wisdom of the spirit operator, will be the perfection of the manifestation. It is telegraphing, and some operators exhaust the force with a few raps, while others may continue them for a long time.

In trance this is still more marked. When a medium resists this action of the spirit, there will be spasmodic action and convulsions more or less violent according to the circumstances and the amount of resistance offered. In the early days of Spiritualism, it was often very distressing to witness the condition of mediums who, either ignorantly or willfully, resisted these influences. To-day there is a better understanding, and we seldom witness any of these violent and undesirable manifestations. The mediums are advised not to resist the influence and the spirits are reasoned with, and also advised as to the proper conditions to control.

All nervous diseases are dependant, in a great measure, upon the action of these two bodies. Convulsions of all kinds are produced by a derangement of this action. Spasmodic and irregular involuntary motions of all kinds, which indicate nervous diseases, result from the same cause. The sudden starts so common among mediums, are produced very frequently by the weakened connection between these bodies incident to mediumship. There may be no spiritual influence at the time, though these persons are generally surrounded by spirits who are seeking opportunities to influence them.

The history of medicine, and especially the superstitions connected with it, reveals an interesting chapter in regard to the influence of the mind through the will, over diseases. The history of all the charms, amulets and disgusting remedies, is but a statement of cases where the influence of the mind through the will is made to produce cures. Indeed it is through the action of the will that medicines generally produce their effect.

Patent or secret medicines act mainly because there is a feeling of confidence inspired by the earnest and enthusiastic representations of those who sell them.

In all systems of medicine, the wise physician knows that it is of the highest importance to have the confidence of the patient both in him or herself or the remedial agents, in order to be successful.

Mesmer said the world would rather depend upon bread pills where the patient had full confidence in him; than to have the ranges of the entire pharmacopia with one who had no faith in him. All physicians, as they grow older, learn to attach more to the action of mind or nature, as they say, and less to medicine. The systems of medicine that are most beneficial and successful, will be found to be those which inspire the most confidence and, set most through the mind. The new systems have been introduced through mental influences, and so long as these can be maintained they will be successful, but when the founders, or the earnest advocates fail to keep up these, and the systems generally become historical.

Mental epidemics have prevailed in all ages, and have powerful effects, either beneficial or otherwise.

We live in an age of progress, and we trust that a knowledge of the relations of the two bodies of which we have spoken, and of the mode of directing the will to act through them and upon them, will become much more general, for it is of essential importance to the highest development and the most perfect health. When mankind learn to dwell more on the soul-plane and less on the animal or physical plane, and when his best energies are devoted to the regulation of these, a new era will have dawned upon the earth, not only as regards the prevention and cure of disease, but that which is far more important, the perfect and harmonious development of the physical on its plane, so that the soul shall manifest higher powers than it has ever exhibited.

ENCOURAGEMENT—AN IMPROVISATION.

BY MISS M. M. JONES.

Oh, souls that walk in midnight darkness,
Wat-hing,—waiting for life's day,
Be patient, morning robed in brightness,
Will, ere long, illume your way.

Oh, hearts that pine in weary sadness,
Struggling on 'mid doubt and fear,
Be hopeful; life is full of gladness,
Behind the clouds the sun shines clear.

Oh spirits fainting day by day,
That wearily onward prest,
Take courage, for the angels say
"This path leads on to quiet rest.

Your tear-dimmed eyes may not yet see
Life's brighter, better side;
But trust; the blessed Deity
Will gently o'er your vision glide.

Nature does not call the flowers
At once to richest bloom;
But each day unfolds their powers
From out earth's silent gloom.

So, from out the darkest life,
Brightest hopes may spring;
And the soul now sad with strife,
Then may gladly sing.

Oh souls! beyond your doubts and fears
Are glorious hidden powers;
And soft mist watered by your tears
Shall bring forth sweetest flowers.

Then trust and hope, whate'er betide,
And o'er beyond your sorrow;
The angels throw the veil aside
And show a bright to-morrow.

Philadelphia, Aug., 1871.

Coal is a vulgar article and attracts little attention. While diamonds are surpassingly showy and admired; yet the value and influence of all the diamonds in the world are trivial in comparison with the value and influence of one ton of coal.—Alger.

The domain of peace has been steadily encroaching on the domain of war.—Ibid.

It matters not what the profession or place or garb of the man who speaks or writes to influence his fellow man. The only question is, does he inspire them with love, purity and grandeur? Is what he teaches true and good? If so, he is an ordained prophet; if not, he is an intruder.—Ibid

The thread of human life is wound upon a great spool, ever turning to the wheels of time. If its strands are laid smoothly and evenly, each revolution finds a little higher, and the threads are beautifully wound upon this spool, but if there are knots and tangles in the thread of life, the spool will not stop for us to take these out, and so they are wound upon it, and revolution after revolution gives evidence of the unevenness which these have produced. It may be, a long time ago.

Beneath the rule of men entirely great
The pen is mightier than the sword.
—Sir E Bulwer Lytton.

The pen has banished the sword from a thousand places where it once flourished in unchallenged supremacy. The sword is now confined to the camp and a few ceremonial occasions, and finds an active vent only in battle. The pen is everywhere, and is, in an innumerable variety of ways, incessantly active. The pen is the highest tool that man has been inspired to invent.

St. Petersburg annually supplies the market with twenty-seven million goose quills, and Birmingham with a thousand million steel pens,—one for every member of the human race! When we see it thus extending its power from the limits of its first feeble obscurity into an importance like that of the omnipresent daylight; when we see it installed in every parlor and bed-chamber, the counting room of the merchant, the factory of the mechanic, the office of the lawyer, the hall of the senate, the bureau of diplomacy, the study of the philosopher, the cell of the convict, the closet of the saint, recording every human transaction, from birth and baptism to will and burial, steadily driving its showy rival, the sword, out from before it, ever becoming more, and making that become less; it is impossible not to own how much mightier is the instrument that drips the black drops of thought than the instrument that drips the red drops of blood. The sword dwindles and darkens; the pen brightens and expands.—Alger.

The works of Aristotle have had an influence immensely greater than the conquests of Alexander. The pen of Voltaire was above the sword of Frederic.—Ibid.

Were it not for poets and historians, the mightiest conquerors of antiquity would be to us but nameless gladiators wasting and bleeding in the remote darkness.—Ibid.

The writer outranks the warrior, and will displace the priest.—Ibid

NOTICE OF MEETINGS.

SEMI-ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The Spiritualists of Hancock county, Maine, will hold their Fourth Semi Annual Convention in Ellsworth, Saturday and Sunday, October 7th and 8th, commencing at ten o'clock A. M.

A cordial invitation is extended to all to come and participate in the good work, and to lend the ear of progress.

By order of the Committee.

M. KINGMAN, Sec.

DEDICATION.

The Spiritualists of Westgrove, Jay Co., Indiana, will dedicate their new hall on September 30th and October 1st, 1871. Mr. O. P. Kellogg of Ohio, will be present, and a good time may be expected.

Ample arrangements will be made for strangers.

A SPIRITUALIST CONVENTION

Will be held at Deansville, Oneida County, New York, on Saturday and Sunday, October 14th and 15th, at 10 A. M., to organize and associate to advance the cause of Spiritualism, and for business purposes; to include the counties of Herkimer, Oneida, Otsego, Chenango, and Madison. Speakers and friends are invited.

Deansville is on the Utica, Clinton and Binghampton Railroad.

Polar condition considered as the source of motion in and through all Atomic Relation—Electric and Electro-Magnetic Polarity, the constitutional Life Measure of matter, and causes of those Polar Conditions constituting the Source of all Motion, or Change in Matter—Electric and Electro-Magnetic Polarity the Cause of Chemical Affinity, Cohesion, Repulsion, and Attraction of Gravitation—Tubular or Battery Key of Elements, through which we learn of Polar Condition as the Cause of Motion.

Electro Negatives—the first given of by the affinity corresponding galvanic or magnetic condition, and numbered as being positive to 1, and 1 to 2, and 2 to 3, and 3, 4 to 5, and 5, advancing thus to 54.	Electro Positives, the last corresponding galvanic or magnetic circuit, numbered negative of 1, and 1 to 2, and 2 to 3, and 3 to 54, and 54 to 55—28 to 30, and 54.	Neutral Salts, compounds of the electro negative and positive conditions numerically added together, as the affinities are intense as the polar conditions numerically differ from each other.
1 Oxygen.	56 Potassium.	Potash.
2 Fluorine.	55 Sodium.	Fluoride of Sodium.
3 Chlorine.	54 Lithium.	Chloride of Lithium.
4 Bromine.	53 Calcium.	Bromide of Calcium.
5 Iodine.	52 Magnesium.	Iodide of Magnesium.
6 Sulphur.	51 Glucinum.	Sulphide of Glucinum.
7 Selenium.	50 Strontium.	Selenide of Strontium.
8 Tellurium.	49 Barium.	Tellurate of Barium.
9 Nitrogen.	48 Yttrium.	Nitrate of Yttrium.
10 Phosphorus.	47 Thorium.	Phosphate of Thorium.
11 Arsenic.	46 Ormium.	Arsiate of Ormium.
12 Antimony.	45 Palladium.	Antimoniate of Palladium.
13 Silicon.	44 Cerium.	Silicate of Cerium.
14 Boron.	43 Zirconium.	Borate of Zirconium.
15 Columbium.	42 Lanthanum.	[From this point the salts become less intense in their affinities, and finally merge into the mere oxyds, Fluorides, Chlorides, Bromides, Iodides, Sulphates, Selliniates, Tellurates, Phosphates, and other combinations, with the metals and alkaline earths.]
16 Tungsten.	41 Aluminum.
17 Molybdenum.	40 Zinc.
18 Manganese.	39 Hydrogen.
19 Thalium.	38 Carbon.
20 Platinum.	37 Cadmium.
21 Uranium.	36 Rubidium.
22 Rhodium.	35 Cobalt.
23 Iridium.	34 Nickel.
24 Vanadium.	33 Iron.
25 Gold.	32 Mercury.
26 Silver.	31 Chromium.
27 Copper.	30 Bismuth.
28 Lead.	29 Tin.

The elements numbered 7, 8, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 23, 28, 34, 35, 36, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 50, 51, 54, are comparatively scarce and unimportant. The new elements, Didymium, Erbium, Niobium, Norium, Ruthenium, Tantalum, Thallium, Thorium, and Indium, have been discovered since my analysis was made.

ELECTRICITY is the inner measure of imponderable life, that determines the measure, form and nature of ponderable matter, and establishes that quantity of polar condition, caused by chemical affinity or imponderable motion in ponderable matter, which in turn establishes those polar or magnetic conditions manifest in the phenomenon of cohesion, repulsion and attraction of gravitation.

Electricity is the name we give to that primitive life we see moving in the most elementary gradations of matter, and this quality of life, in turn, gives form and magnetic character to all resulting individualities.

Electricity, as a permeating existence, or primary principle of action, is evidently a diverse polar (or positive and negative) unity of infinite extent, and in many of its phases of phenomenal change, exhibits the characteristics of natural, permanent and artificial magnets.

The following record of elements successively given off, by the affinity suspending current of battery decomposition, published in this article for reference, convinces me really the electrical nuclei life, form and measure, of atomic conditions, necessarily dual in themselves—containing within the polar source of motion when their electro-atomic equilibrium is disturbed by the demand of any polar correlation without.

A critical recurrence to the elementary record will show that negative oxygen numbering (1) or the lowest electrical measure or life form of inorganic condition, is most powerfully attracted to positive potassium numbering (56), or highest electrical measure or life form of inorganic condition.

Practical experiment will show that oxygen has a stronger affinity for potassium than any other element (known at the time of this analysis) The same is true of potassium's affinity for oxygen. The electro-negatives, oxygen, fluorine, chlorine, bromine, iodine and sulphur, show but little, if any, affinity for each other. Nor has potassium, sodium, lithium, calcium, barium or strontium, much, if any affinity for each other. Nor has any element, positive or negative, much, if any, affinity for its nearest numerical neighbor.

On the converse, however, the strongest affinities exist between elements of the greatest numerical distance, decreasing in proportion as the numerical distance decreases. A strict analytic observation of the phenomenal facts in the premises will give us the primary mathematical rules of chemical force, by which alone we can harness nature in the demonstrations of correlation, action and reaction, and advance to a comparative analytical understanding of the inherent rationale of things, as high as the polar brain of our being, to which chemistry conducts us on the pathway of fact when its mathematical, or, more accurately, astronometry, so to speak, goes on, as if on an astronomical plane, to scan by a known parity of polar action, all the central and circumferent regions of space.

In this brief survey of polar conditions as the source of motion in matter—so to speak—we find atomic condition held together, with an intensity, or strength, apportioned to the polar diversity of the two elements entering into the condition, constituting the compound. Such is the nature and character of the electrical basis of cohesion. On the other hand, we find that any two elements of the nearest electrical polarities, have no affinity for, and will not cohere with each other, or with any of the non conductors, or electro-magnets, be charged with electricity to the fullest extent, this surcharged condition causes them to repell each other. Such is the nature and character of the electrical basis of repulsion.

The electrical extension of this polar source of motion in matter—so-called—forms and links alike, all the orbs and spheres of space, and thus constitute the basis of attraction of gravitation, as in the former instances, it formed the basis, of chemical affinity, cohesion and repulsion.

To provide ourselves with the simple key, which this battery record gives, is to secure our direct access to every department of nature it is human to analyze and comprehend, apportioned to the mind's progress, from the finite to the infinite.

Fully comprehending the incomparable advantages a practical knowledge of the source of motion in matter, derived from these premises, will give, we have briefly set them forth, under a deeper sense of duty, to those who would learn from nature, than the seemingly learned mechanics of pompous books and estate, who live on their speculations.

It may not be amiss to state in this connection that the practical knowledge to be derived from these premises, carefully analyzed, self adjusted and stored away in the mind, will at once become its chief analytic key of memory, that will ominously unlock to the god-like comprehension of its possessor a most wondrous range of correlational life measure of condition, one, as yet, little dreamed of by other, than the electro-positive source of infinite mind, magnetically illuminating our mental being, as apportioned to our own individualized receptivities.

I am fully aware of the grave question as to the practical propriety of introducing the science of chemistry in the unusual manner to the general reader. Yet, differing as I do, from those who conscientiously adhere to the more renowned tunnelling systems of highly professional age, I have adopted, as I believe, the most direct course to attain the end in view.

Though the general reader may not comprehend so many common place details in the outset of this course, he will, it is hoped, obtain an insight into the nature and character of the operative forces referred to, as will, without the usual mystifications of learned scientific array, lead him direct to unlock the detailed secrets of nature in a much more simple and comprehensive way than our more learned book makers, the learnedly fashionable of whom are the most adish of all the affected dandies of wise pretence. It may be well enough to remark to such as may desire a cheap text work on chemistry that will answer to familiarize their minds with the received opinions concerning the general system of chemical classification, that the late work of Professor Youmans can be procured through the Religio Philosophical Publishing House for one dollar and fifty cents, and will prove easy, apt and generally available for the purposes in view.

Liberal thinkers must feel the deep importance of comprehending the laws of nature, and are doubtless aware of the special province of chemistry to analyze and consider them.

MEDIUMS.

Dr. Abba Lord Palmer.

BOX 101, NEW BOSTON, ILLINOIS

WONDERFUL PSYCHOMETRIST AND CLAIRVOYANT PHYSICIAN, SOUL READER AND BUSINESS MEDIUM.

Can diagnose disease by Rhemen, autograph, lock of hair, without a failure, and give prescription, which, if followed, will surely cure.

Can trace stolen property, tell the past, present and future.—advise concerning business, and give written communications from spirit friends.

Diagnosis of disease, with prescription, $2.00. Communications from spirit friends, $3.00. Delineation of character with advice concerning marriage, $1.00.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago,

Mrs. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for medicating the blood and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognisance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well who the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $2.00; each subsequent, $1.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $5; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

DR. SAMUEL MAXWELL,

MAGNETIC PHYSICIAN,

CHRISTIANITY AND SPIRITUALISM OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY COMPARED.

By Wm. B. Fahnestock.

CHRISTIANITY.

The Christian doctrines of the present day consist principally of a belief in a triune God, in original sin, in the necessity of baptism by water, whether by sprinkling or immersion, in the resurrection of the physical body, in a day of judgment, a personal devil, eternal punishment for the wicked in a lake of fire and brimstone, a belief in Christ as the only son of God, the forgiveness and the redemption from sins. That there is a life beyond the grave, where, after a general resurrection, the evil will be separated from the good, the former will be cast into hell-fire forever, where there will be "a wailing and a gnashing of teeth." The latter will be transported into heaven, where the endless day of eternity will be spent in singing praises to the honor and glory of the God they worship.

They believe God to be an angry and a jealous God ("that visits the sins of the fathers upon the children of the third and fourth generations,") and to consist of three persons, viz., "the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one God."

It is unfortunate for the probability of this doctrine, that such a combination of gods can exist; because the only passage in the Bible which couples them together, is not found in the original Greek Testament, and consequently ought not to be in the English translation. See first epistle of John, fifth chapter and seventh verse of the English translation, where it reads, "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one."

This verse is not found in the original Greek, and therefore ought not to be in the translation. The question, therefore, naturally arises, how came it there, if it is not in the original Greek Testament, from which the translation was made? It could not have been put there by mistake, and is, beyond the possibility of a doubt, an interpolation placed there by designing men, who could not get up a belief that Christ was the only begotten son of God without it; as the great foundation or cornerstone of the Christian edifice—the plan of salvation—is built upon the faith or belief that the sufferings of Christ upon the cross is an all-sufficient atonement for the sins of the world, and that a belief in him will expiate all sins—no matter how monstrous they may have been—at the eleventh hour of life. It was therefore necessary to have something in the Bible to show that he was a part of the Trinity, and consequently equal with God. Hence, we have in this verse the idea of the immaculate conception, the incarnation and the sacrificial atonement.

The doctrine of original sin is on a par with the Mosaic description of how it took place. The fall, as defined and understood by religionists, represents an Omnipotent, Omniscient, Omnipresent God, having as little common sense as an idiot, by stating that "as He desired to know whether man would be obedient, He set up an apple tree and forbade him to eat of its fruit, and then a snake, being opposed to God, persuaded the woman to do that which God, if He were Omniscient, certainly knew that she would do before the trial was made."

This silly tale is the foundation of the Christian belief in original sin; and is as improbable as it is puerile, unmeaning and destitute of reason and common sense.

In regard to the necessity of baptism, I have but to remark that it is a religious ceremony by which the person is initiated into the visible church of Christ, but as it is necessary that man should so live as to be his own savior, the ceremony will not aid him, nor stand between him and the penalty for transgression. It is therefore evident that it can not be essential to salvation.

A general day of judgment, a personal devil, and the eternal punishment of the wicked in a lake of fire and brimstone, are alike ideal or imaginary scarecrows to frighten the wicked and hold them in subjection to the forms of the church, neither of them having an existence in fact.

The judgment day of each spirit will closely follow its separation from the physical body, and as God is in every spirit, every spirit must be its own judge.

It is true there are spirits less good than others, but there is no special personal devil, and as every transgression of a law, whether physical or moral, carries its own penalty with it, it follows that the penalty must be suffered, either here or in the spirit world, but there is no hell-fire, and although the condition resulting from the transgression of laws will no doubt be severe in proportion to the magnitude of the transgression, yet the penalty must have an end, and can not last forever.

The doctrine that Christ is the only son of God, or that he is equal with God, Christ has himself denied, for although he said that "I and the Father are one," he also said, "the Father is greater than I."

It is therefore plain logic that if the Father is greater than the son, it is self evident that the son can not be equal in greatness with the Father. Christ said truly that "the Father and I are one," and so is every man, woman and child one with the Father, but still the Father is greater than all. Therefore Christ can not, according to his own saying, be equal with the Father. Christ was, no doubt, one of the best men that ever lived, and as such ought to be venerated but not worshiped.

The forgiveness, or the redemption from sins by the sufferings of Christ, is out of the question, for all sins are unpardonable and the penalty attached to each must be suffered until the transgression be expiated and as fire and brimstone are both material substances, it is contrary to law as well as to reason that they can have an existence in the spirit world; while the suffering for transgressions and the happiness enjoyed by those who have lived in accordance with laws, are conditions which the spirit suffers or enjoys, as he has transgressed or lived in accordance with the same.

The idea of heaven, conveyed by the Scriptures, is as cheerless as the idea of a Christian hell is impossible, and I fear the monotony of sitting on a cloud and singing praises for ever, would be as senseless and burdensome that it would require a little of the Christian hell to make it even bearable.

The belief, too, that God is an angry and a jealous God, is incompatible with his being a God of love, and if he be Omnipotent, Omniscient and Omnipresent, it is impossible that he could be angry or jealous, for he must be all-powerful, all good, all wise and ever present, consequently omniscient; all, for to him eternity is an eternal present. Man can not comprehend the reality, but as time and space have no existence in the spirit world, the progressive spirit is enabled to learn the past, and to observe the future in exact proportion to its advancement; while to the incomprehensible power of the Great Spirit, the past and the future are known as the present.

SPIRITUALISM.

Spiritualism teaches that there is but one God,—Jehovah, the Great Spirit, or the great I AM, and that he is a God of Love, a Principle of power, wisdom and goodness, which is in every person and thing that exists, governing the universe by fixed laws, is everywhere at one and the same time, and the only positive and unchangeable fact in existence.

It inculcates that Christ was a man born in the flesh, like other men, was a natural medium or somnambulic, and consequently possessed of all the powers usual to persons who can enter that state at will, and was, of course, mediumistic, or impressible in a very high degree.

It teaches that man was born pure, as a man, and that there is no such thing as original sin, resulting from the supposed apostacy of Adam; that baptism is a ceremony invented and insisted upon by the priesthood, to hoodwink the ignorant, and to hold the credulous in the doctrinal bondage of the church.

It teaches that there is a physical body, and a spiritual body, and that the resurrection of the physical body is an impossibility, and that it is only the spiritual body that rises. That there is no special or general day of judgment, but that each spirit has its own day, and that the spirit within, judges itself; that there is no personal devil; but that there are many spirits less good than others, and that there is not one perfect; consequently there is a necessity that all must eventually repent and progress, even beyond the grave.

It teaches that there is no hell-fire, but that sin, or the transgression of any law, whether physical or moral, will inflict a penalty in proportion to the magnitude of the transgression, and that there is no escape from the penalty, either here or hereafter.

All sins, therefore, are unpardonable, and can not be forgiven or atoned for, by any one else; every one must be their own savior, and that heaven is not a particular place, but a condition of happiness, bliss, or ecstatic felicity of the spirit that can not be imagined, much less described, and as progression is a universal law, the scenes and conditions are constantly changing, as the wisdom and goodness of the spirit increases; consequently, there is no sameness, no monotony, no fatigue.

Choose ye, one and all, between the two.

A RELIGIOUS WAR.

By Prof. W. H. Chaney.

Yes, war is impending over this nation, and "the signs of the times" indicate it just as plainly as they did "the late unpleasantness," years before the nation was startled by the attack upon Fort Sumpter. This outrage upon, and disgrace to, our civilization, may be justly styled a moral and political war, and should never have occurred. Still, the lesson which it has taught may prove valuable if the American people profit by experience. I fear they will not, and hence my apprehension of war—of a religious war.

Away down the centuries of the past, the race became steeped in ignorance and superstition. Cunning priests seized the opportunity to glorify themselves and rise into authority by the grand, omnific words, "Thus saith the Lord!" For more than a thousand years priestly rule was supreme. Not even kings dare question it.

Four hundred years ago there was a dawn of light. The mariner's compass, the discovery of a new world, the art of printing, and other evidences of man's quickening intellect, were so many blows aimed at cruel, bloodthirsty, priestly power. The apostacy of Luther, the "Reformation," and mad persecution, were the legitimate results of dawning light—a struggle by the people for more freedom, met by death, in the name of the Lord, on the part of their priestly oppressors. That struggle has been persistent for centuries.

For more than a hundred years the Church warred against Geology, but has been vanquished at last. The truths of Astronomy have been established in spite of Galileo's imprisonment, and the steadily increasing light burst into a glorious sunrise when at last the telegraph between mortal and spirit life became once established.

True, there has been a terrible shaking among the churches during the past twenty-five years, and the enthusiastic liberalists look upon the victory as already won. I wish I could think so too, but I can not. I am suspicious that the enemies of free thought are secretly organizing for victory—victory by strategy if they can; by force if they must.

The clerical movements against freemasonry; their attempt to pass laws against mediums; their efforts to make the Constitution of the United States a bulwark for the churches, are only attempts to advance their pickets, betraying a zeal and boldness on the part of the skirmishers not to be expected unless supported by an immense army, which is discreetly kept in the background.

The recent riot in New York was no part of their programme, and took place contrary to the wishes of the chief managers. It was a serious drawback to their deep-laid schemes, resulting from the over zeal of the common people, who are never trusted with full details of priestly plottings. Yet that riot teaches us an awful lesson, namely, that the laity are thirsting for blood, and that when the signal may be given, they will rush to the slaughter. If they act as boldly as they did on the twelfth of July, in defiance of state and city authority, what can we expect when the priests order them to rise simultaneously, in all parts of the country, to re-enact the scenes of St. Bartholomew?

For years Protestantism has been drifting toward Papacy, and Papacy has been becoming more infidel. Protestants are to-day ignorantly doing the work of Papistry—are digging their own graves—for should the crash come, Protestant and Spiritualist will share the same fate. Yet in their mad zeal to crush Spiritualism, which is but another name for free thought, our Protestant neighbors will not see that they are digging a pit for themselves.

The Pope must seek a new basis. Every one with half an eye can see upon the signs of the times, has been aware of this fact for years. So, too, it is evident that his holiness has long been looking to America as that home. With true Jesuitic cunning, the priests have been secretly laboring for more than a quarter of a century to prepare that home, and now the work is nearly completed.

The metropolitan city of the country is entirely under the control of the Romish Church, though for prudential reasons that control is not always exerted, or exerted secretly. Under various pretexts, armed organizations have sprung up all over the country, well officered and drilled. An occasional feint is made, but this is is only done to blind American eyes, for their preparations are always made in publicly, that they know our government will interfere and stop them. The rank and file are kept in ignorance of the deeper plottings, and rush with an earnestness which they might not exhibit if told that it was all a farce.

Perhaps I am sounding a false alarm. Very well; for argument's sake I will admit that I am. But that is the case wherein belief sound a thousand false alarms than fail to give a true one. If all act upon the alarm as though it were true, and it turns out false, no harm will result, and we shall have but done our duty. We do not propose violence, persecution or even religious intolerance, but to prevent these evils.

The Free Masons have ever been the friends of freedom and religious toleration. Fifty-two of the fifty-six who signed the Declaration of Independence were Masons. So was every officer in the Revolutionary army, of any note, save Benedict Arnold! A large majority of the members of the Convention which framed our Constitution were Free Masons. In spite of the Morgan sensation, which was only a political movement, the Masonic record in this country is a bright one, always tolerant. Now witness the deep cunning of crafty priests. Their first move is peaceable, and so they are trying to strengthen themselves by weakening their enemies. Silly protestant clergymen are put forward to denounce Masonry as a pagan and unchristian institution. The object is to make it unpopular so that the young Christians will shun it, for no Mason will ever vote for establishing religious tests. What I know to be true regarding Masonry, I believe to be true regarding Odd Fellowship. So this brotherhood is attacked in like manner.

Now I propose that we meet the enemy on his chosen field. We cannot advise the young men to become Masons nor Odd Fellows; nor is this necessary. But we can instruct them in the philosophy of our government and point out the danger to be apprehended should any religious sect get the control. Teach them that no denomination, not even Spiritualists or free religionists should be trusted with a power so dangerous, for revolution and bloodshed must be the inevitable consequences. Our hope lies with the young, and we must snatch them from the enemy, rather than permit the enemy to steal them from us.

In Eastern Oregon, I have lectured in Auburn, Baker City, El Dorado, Malheur, Union, La Grande and Summerville, and everywhere a large majority attended, and I have reason to believe accepted the truths taught. Everywhere I warned them against the insidious foe to civil and religious liberty, and I trust that good will result.

I am now on the eve of starting down the Columbia river, and until further notice, Portland, Oregon, will be my Post Office address—probably till the end of the year. I lecture also on Astrology, giving a delineation at the close of each lecture, making converts to the astral science of those who are afraid to give up hell and damnation. At the slow progress I am making, it will require two years to complete my lecturing tour on the Pacific coast. Not a clergyman has yet accepted my challenge for a public debate, but I hope to catch one in Portland.

HOW OLD IS THE WORLD?

By T. J. Moore.

It is true that neither the "Testimony of the Rocks" or any other geological testimony, gives us any actual mathematical proof of the world's great antiquity, but does offer a great amount of evidence that its age is measured by millions of years. The distinguished astromoner Faye, the discover of "Faye's comet," believes, with other eminent astromoners, "that during the carbonilferous period the sun had not been condensed to its present size, but that late in that period it was a nebula of 47 degrees in diameter, and that its heat was much greater than now," which sufficiently explains the carboniferous flora (in part, at least,) in the polar regions.

Let us now see what proof we can get from the stars in answer to my question. The ancients divided the stars into two classes, viz: Fixed and Erratic. The latter included the five primary planets that appear as stars, and an occasional tailless comet, for these seemed to them to be wandering about celestial space without much regard to speed or direction. But the stars proper they called fixed, for to the people of these early days they seemed to stand still, never to change their places. But nothing is so absurd now as the belief that any of the heavenly bodies stand still. All are in motion, all suns, stars, planets, comets, asteroids and meteorids are in constant, perpetual, and rapid motion.

Dr. Wm. Herschel first suggested, and really detected the sun's motion nearly 100 years ago. The stars, as well as the secondary planets have two kinds of motion.

1st. A rotation on their axes.

2nd. An orbitual motion, by which they pursue a curvilinear path around some center.

Dr. H says the sun is moving (with its family of little ones), about 180 000 000 miles a year. This is over 300 miles a minute.

Some twenty-five or thirty years ago Dr. Maedler, one of the best of living astronomers, commenced a series of very delicate and extensive observations in regard to the motion of the fixed stars, with a view to find a center, around which our sun, and the entire starry heavens, included within the limits of the milky way, revolve," and arrives at the conclusion that the "center is within the group of the Pleiades, and that Alcyone—he brightest star of the group—has the greatest probability of being the Central Sun."

He fixes its distance from us at 34 000 000 times greater than that of the sun, so that light moving 12 000 000 miles in a minute would require 527 years to pass over it. And says: "Our sun will be 18,200,000 in completing one circuit about it.

Here we see our sun performing an orbit requiring so many millions of years, accompanied in its journey by millions on millions of other suns around this inconceivably distant center. And can any man of even a moderate knowledge of astronomy, suppose that the sun is on its first circuit around the center? and that it has only been here five, six or seven thousand years? It is too preposterous for belief. It is quite probable that this great system has been in existence millions of ages, and our most eminent astronomers are constantly making calculations, running backwards and forwards through millions of years, without even a shadow of doubt on their minds but they are treading on solid ground.

To get further proof of the high antiquity of the earth we will see what the motions of the moon demonstrate.

It was found, by comparing the records of the most ancient lunar eclipses of the Chaldean and Arabian astronomers with those of modern times, that the period of the moon's revolution at present is sensibly shorter than at these remote epochs. Well, let us see how much shorter. Very accurate observation makes the lunar period decrease at the rate of eleven seconds in a hundred years; only think of the accuracy of the observation! Inasmuch as only one second of time in nine years, or less than two minutes in a thousand years! And yet this real discrepancy must be accounted for.

It was found to be due to what is known among astronomers, as the "secular variation of the elements of the earth's orbit," which simple means, those variations that occur in the eccentricity of the earth's orbit, which sweep over immense cycles of ages. This problem was justly deemed a very difficult one, and it is only a few years since any one dared to grapple it. In 1867 Prof. John L. Stockwell, of New England, undertook to solve it. He commenced his calculations by running a million of years forward in 1867.

1968 he made another series of calculations, "beginning 75,000 years back of the present year, and extending them back 1 000,000 years, so that the entire time embraced is over 2 000,000 of years." The eccentricity of the earth's orbit has been decreasing from a low maximum 100,000 years ago, to a minimum which it will reach in about 21 000 years.

To show the reader something of the increase and decrease of these secular (long) variations, I will quote a few items from the Professor's report in Silliman's Journal. He says: "In future time there will be a minimum in 21 000 years, a low maximum in 150 000, another low maximum in 250,000; a very low minimum in 300 000; a high maximum in 515,000; and extreme maximum in 610 000, and so on."

In running his calculations back a million years, he closes as follows: "There was an extreme maximum 850 000 years ago and another 950 000."

These secular variations are deemed of great interest to astronomers, as upon the variations of eccentricity depend the amount of heat which the earth receives from the sun. The greater the eccentricity, the greater amount of heat the earth derives from it, for it is a well-known fact, that "the mean annual amount of heat and light received by any planet from the sun, is (other things being equal) as the minor axis of the ellipse described by it." Any variation therefore in the eccentricity by changing the minor axis, will alter the mean temperature of the surface. All the variations of eccentricity are due to the lengthening or shortening of the minor axis, for the major axes of all the planetary orbits are invariable. It was probably during some of these periods of high maxima that occurred millions of ages back, that the heat of the earth became so great as to generate those gigantic ferns that are found in our coal beds, which attained a height of 40 to 70 feet, which now scarcely reach 10 feet.

Perhaps these few figures and facts that I have here hastily presented, may give to some of your readers some new idea in regard to the probable age of the world, or, at least, may set a new train of thought before them.

It is not pretended, in this communication, that the figures given in Meedler's calculations are absolutely correct, but it is asserted that they are substantially true and approximately correct. The distance he locates the central sun, may be a thousand million miles too small, or it may be ten thousand million miles too great.

Starfield, Ill., Aug. 1, 1870.

P. S. From the foregoing figures and facts, we plainly see that the Mosaic account of the creation of the world as contained in the book of "Infallible Revelations" is a wild, visionary, stupid monstrosity.

Statuvolence.

This is a big, jaw-breaking word, and should name a reality. It is intended to mean that all magnetized persons have magnetized themselves. It means that the operator when he thinks that he has used, as an instrument of his will, his nervous fluid, or his animal magnetism (the best name), he has only proved his ignorance, deceived himself and fooled others. He hopes to be able to take Henry T. Child by the hand yet as a full believer in his theory. And yet this same sapient writer, Fahnestock, in the next to the last paragraph, in the last number of the JOURNAL, September 16th, confesses that there is such an aura, but he triumphantly asks, "Is it intelligent?" Who pretends that a gun is intelligent because it exists and you can kill a deer with it? What need has my magnetism of intelligence, though I heal with it—produce sleep with it? If I am ill make the patient sick with it, etc., etc.?

He has admitted in the paragraph referred to, that it is not always effete. I have carefully perused Fahnestock's work, and find strange errors in it. He says magnetized persons when first magnetized sometimes fail to remember what occurred in the sleep, but after a few times they can will to remember, and so remember all. I have thirty years' proof that this is not so. I have always found, with two exceptions in several thousands put to sleep by me, that from the 4th, 5th, and 6th degree, they can bring nothing, only when I will them to remember; and of six clairvoyants used a long time, every one soon became incapable of remembering anything when I strongly willed, or, if you please, commanded them to remember.

That question about intelligence confounds me nearly as much as his mental philosophy does. He means well, no doubt.

I'm brief, you see, as usual. I feel that I owe this to your readers.

The Philosophy of Integrity and Crime.

The following article clipped from the Brunswick Telegraph, teaches us that religion is no safeguard against the commission of crime by the devotee. A well written article or thesis upon the above entitled subject will be acceptable:

Had a bombshell or a meteoric stone been cast into the middle of Main Street, on Saturday last, it would have created no greater surprise than the announcement then first made public, that Col. John Rogers, cashier of the Pejepscot National Bank, was a defaulter, in the sum of $36 000. True, a few people assert, it was just what might have been expected; but in almost if not all these cases it can be found that personal feeling had much to do in summing up this judgment. Col. Rogers is a man of affable manners at times, and as unyielding as the hills. The people generally, however, got on amicably with him, and he has for years had the unbounded confidence of his fellow citizens. To settle the estate of a deceased person the aid of Mr. Rogers was sought, and he has managed for a very long period of time the property and investments of ladies and others unfamiliar with business. His apparently upright business conduct, his stern and rigid discharge of religious duty, his long membership with the Congregational Church, for a period as acting deacon, entitled him to the regard of his fellow men. To outward eyes, his life was in full accord with his professions. When he fell is not known, at least to the public. Be it earlier or later, he has won for himself the epithet of hypocrite, the most offensive which can be applied to mortal man. It is the tremendous blow given to Christian and business honor which makes the fall of Col. Rogers so deplorable. Religion may not be at fault, but it is sadly wounded, in the house of its would-be friends, when it is used as a cloak to cover wickedness of any description. If convicted of the crime alleged against him, he may be pronounced a scoundrel of the blackest dye. We speak plainly, but without a particle of feeling against Mr. Rogers, for our relations with him have ever been of the most amicable kind, and no one feels more keenly than we do that he has been led into temptation. His family, one of the worthiest and most interesting in town, has the sympathies of the entire community.

Acts and Joint Resolutions Passed by the General Assembly of Virginia at its Session of 1870-71.

Schedule A, No. 187.—Book agents. Any person who shall receive subscriptions for, or shall in any manner furnish newspapers, books, maps, prints, pamphlets or periodicals, otherwise than by sale, printed or published beyond the limits of this state, shall be deemed to be a book-agent.

Any person desiring to distribute or sell any religious books, newspapers, pamphlets or periodicals, may apply to the judge of the court or corporation in which he may desire to distribute or sell the same, and such a judge, upon being satisfied that the person applying is of character and a proper person in whom to confide the trust of selling or distributing such books, may direct the assessor to grant him a license, with nominal tax only.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall pay a fine of not less than fifty dollars, nor more than one hundred dollars for each offense.

Virginia, Montgomery County.—To-wit, I hereby certify that I shall this day assess the license-tax imposed by law on James H. Barnes to be ten dollars, for the privilege of circulating papers from the 1st of May, 1871, to the 30th of April, 1872.

Under my hand this 4th of August, 1871. Fee 75 cents.

M. V. SMITH, A. S. A.

Voices from the People.

OSAGE, IOWA.—Henry Brooks writes.—We of Northern Iowa have been blessed with a visit from Dr. J. C. Howes and wife, clairvoyants and healing mediums. They were here about two weeks and performed some wonderful cures of chronic diseases, that had been tried by other doctors, who failed to cure them. They gave very fine tests.

ASHLEY, OHIO.—C. F. Randolph writes.—You will please find inclosed one dollar and fifty cents, for which, please continue the paper. Our little band of Spiritualists are still alive in Ashley. The burning of our hall last July did not born Spiritualism. Mrs. E. N. Shaw, of Illinois, has been with us once a month this summer, and has caused quite a shaking amongst the dry bones. She lectured to a large audience last Sunday evening, in the town hall. She lectured at Orelington, eight miles away from this place, yesterday and to day.

PEOTONE, ILL.—T. W. Calkins writes.—It is useless for me to say that the cause is doing well in Peotone, as you can see by the number of subscribers to your paper.

WALLA WALLA, W. T.—B. F. Cross writes.—There are a few open defenders of Spiritualism here. In this town of only two thousand, we have twenty saloons in full blast. There is more bigotry here than in any other town I have lived in on the coast, and the strongest denominations are the upholders of Pius the last. There are the Congregational, Methodist, the United Brethren and the Campbellites, with but few communicants, while the Romanists are quite strong, and always have a full attendance. But when there is any scandal, there is no trouble in tracing it to a church member.

GARNETT, KANSAS.—E. C. Dewey writes.—Please find inclosed five dollars, which you will place to my credit for arrearages. I can not think of doing without the JOURNAL. Although I have been in arrears for so long. Have thought of stopping the paper, but could not think of asking it while not paid for. But it has seemed for a long time as though I never could pay up, but having raised as much of the amount, I can not have it stopped.

AMES, IOWA.—O. P. Burnham writes.—As my remittance ran out July 12th, I forward one dollar for the JOURNAL, hoping to continue to be able to receive it, as we can not very well do without it. After reading the account of Mr. Severance, on progression, I would be glad to give every one I meet that number of the paper. There are so few progressive minds around me that I get faint and weary by the way, yet I sow the seed hoping some day to say that I have reaped and bring forth good fruit. The JOURNAL weekly brings the bread of life to such as I. Am living mostly alone, as regards soul life. I love the discussion with Dr. Fahnestock and consider the subject of both deep interest to me, being myself a healer. Under spirit power the sick are healed and the deaf restored by coming into my presence, but I do not feel that I am in a somnambulic condition in my presence. I have a deep interest in Mrs. Wilcoxson.

BRIGHTON, IND.—M. J. S. Gilman writes.—I can not do without your paper—would feel that a link had been broken in my chain of friendship.

PEORIA, ILL.—R. Bolton writes.—The "Search after God" is splendid. Oh, there is food for the mind in it. Such bold thoughts are contained therein—facts and ideas that can not be gainsayed or denied.

FLINT, MICH.—O. V. Warriner writes.—I have been reading your valuable paper—borrowed it from a friend, but could not borrow food for my soul any longer.

Thank you, brother, for becoming a subscriber. Hope you will now lend your paper, as others have loaned theirs to you. That is an excellent way to make Spiritualists.—ED. JOURNAL.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Dr. Simon Van Etten writes.—I send you one dollar for your paper for a poor soldier who lost his health in defending his country's life. A few years since he fell and broke his very kind to him for his bravery. They gave him a pension of forty-eight dollars a year up to the 4th of September, then he was told that his pay would be but twenty-four dollars a year. I call on him at my office to day. I gave him a copy of the JOURNAL, told him that I would send you a dollar and ask you to send him your paper as long as you can for it. I give it to him, as he is not able to get it, and so desired to read it. His name is John Thomas, of Alexandria, Virginia, formerly of New York. Let me hear how long you can afford to send your paper for the small sum of one dollar. Be liberal as you can.

Remarks:—We will add another dollar to yours, and send the paper eight months.

WHITE OAK, TEXAS.—Mrs. Caroline E. Carey writes.—I take great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your welcome paper since I arrived in Texas. Your kindness in sending it to me free, is something that excites my warmest gratitude, for I know nothing but true benevolence prompts you to do it. In the perusal of the "Search after God" I have been deeply interested—it has suggested ideas to my mind that I think might have lain dormant for years, perhaps during my stay in the body, but now, thanks to Brother Francis and your kindness, my eyes are opening, and although my orthodox friends say it is the work of the devil, as prophesied in the Bible, yet my hungry soul continues the investigation, and I now feel that I must have more light. Brother Jones, let me say I have never read any book or paper in my life but the JOURNAL that has given me such a true insight and direction in the intellectual efforts of the two sexes, and I do consider that woman is indebted to you her warmest gratitude for your just appreciation of her talents. And she yearns with more of it in life, that she would be able to prove to the world that she is intended for a higher sphere than she is at present crushed into.

ELDORA, IOWA.—W. Bullard writes.—My time as a trial subscriber having expired the 1st of April last, I will remit one dollar and fifty cents, as payment on the JOURNAL for six months, and hope you will excuse me for delaying for so long a time. To day I attended the first lecture on Spiritualism that I have heard since I have been in Iowa, near New Providence, delivered by F. B. Dowd; and although he commenced by saying that before an audience, on whatever subject you will, he is always equal to the emergency. The Spiritualists in that neighborhood, the same as here, are few, but they are generous and true to their noble cause. There is an element in us that seems to inspire our moral and spiritual nature to work for humanity instead of blindly worshiping orthodox priests and idols. Quite a number attended the lecture from Iowa Falls. Two or three ladies, fine test mediums, were with them. A harmonious circle was held in the house of Brother Henshaw; several splendid tests were given.

TAMA CITY, IOWA.—Mr. Isaiah Hills writes.—As the time I have paid for the JOURNAL will be up the 1st of September, I feel it my duty to write and tell you I have to discontinue for a time, for I am an old man, almost seventy-two years, unable to work, and being in poor health I can not spare the money. Parting with the paper will be a loss indeed, as a dear and true friend, for it is the poor man's friend. To me it is a staff for my declining years. It is cheering to hear of the messages from the bright Summer Land to which I am going. If I ever get the money I will send for the JOURNAL, if not, I trust I shall be able to ever take it again, shall think of the comfort it did give me while I took it. May the choicest blessings of the angels ever be yours, is my prayer.

Remarks:—We will continue the JOURNAL to you, and perhaps the good angels will inspire some one or more to send a special contribution to pay for it. We shall see!

ALLEGAN, MICH.—M. C. Vandercook writes.—You will find one dollar inclosed for the continuation of my subscription. Your paper is a true missionary among the theological heathen of our land. They are in wonder at the independent course you take for the promulgation of free thought. Speed on, good messenger of truth, unbar the prison doors of false Christianity and let the good angels go in.

Thoughts on the Bible Account of the First Day's Work of God, or the Beginning.

NUMBER I.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."—Gen. 1 : 1."

Will God's good ministers,—some one, true and pious soul,—tell us where God dwelt before "the heaven" was created? Also how much older the heaven is than the earth? Are they of the same age? Is God of either "the heaven," or "the earth?" May it not be (and it seems probable), that the Hebrew God is the expelled mind or being, "cast into abysmal darkness," space, and has built him, made, created him, a world, on which to dwell, out of which, he will in the cycles of the future, bring forth an army of immortals, attack his conqueror, and regain the realm from which he may have been expelled?

To us, "the heaven and the earth" are one; the earth the floor, the heaven the roof of the Father's house, and all between the roof and floor, the mansions—our future homes—we, the tenants of a good and kind Landlord, who trusts us for our rent. How is it Christians, am I right?

"And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.—Gen. 1 : 2."

Without form, shapeless, having neither depth, breadth, or circumference,—void! No place, empty, unoccupied, without substance, ergo heaven in the same condition, and out of the same void and waste. We ask, with solemn thoughts, our soul's future hanging in the balance, where was God in this awful period, when neither form or substance existed? Was he soul or matter, in the dark or light? Come holy men of God, solve this problem for us. Or, will you yield the point, and confess your ignorance of the whole subject? Is Mr. Francis right in his search? Who will find him first?

That was a fearful period, that first day in which God went forth into unknown space, without light, or pilot, or chart, or compass; went so far that he lost his reckoning; could not return, hence had to build him a new house or world; or, was he cast forth from somewhere, by a greater power than himself? We ask for light? Who will come to our help?

"And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

This spirit, according to the Soul-sleeper or Advent theory, was, and yet is, a breath of air, a puff of wind, no more, no less. Not a form or being, ergo, these have no personal God. Is there a personal God? We will wait and see if Bro. Francis in his search finds him. "Moved upon the face of the waters"—was there any water? There was no matter, no form: all was void. On what rested the waters? Were the waters flying in mist, through space, and the Spirit of God having a wild ride in its midst; seeking a place on which to rest his weary spirit; all alone in the midst of mist through space? And there was no light, no land, no limits, hence no harbor in which God could bring to anchor his mystic ship. Where was God? Echo answers, where?

"And God said, let there be light; and there was light.—Gen. 1 : 3."

What light was this. Ordered three full days before the sun, moon, and stars were made; ordered,—not created or made,—but ordered from somewhere? Not the golden light of the sun, or the silvery light of the moon and stars, under which we live and have our being, for the earth, the heaven, the waters, the firmament, the grass, herbs, trees, are all older than the sun or moon or stars. Whence came this light, O Soul of things, the light illuminating space, penetrating night's mystic cave, rending the vail asunder, sending forth sparks of Infinitism—future mortals, immortals to be? Say, O Soul of things, art Thou in me, and I in Thee? Speak out of the mystic past unto this material, what will be my spiritual future? Hark, he speaketh from out of the womb of the past, "Child of mine, thou art from the beginning, throughout the whole, an entity eternal, bound for the infinite goal. I send thee forth, I call thee back. I am thy soul, thou art my body. I the law, matter in its various forms the phenomena of the law.

"And God said, let there be light; and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good, and God divided the light from the darkness.—Gen. 1 : 4."

"And God saw the light." (?)—the light of reason, the spirit—soul spark one with himself, eternal in the "I am that I am." And the law was good—"and the light was good." The law provided instinct for the beast, reason for man; the animal part forming the magnetic battery, the spiritual, the electric battery; the material, of the "earth, earthy," the other, of the air, pure, spirit eternal; the body, matter, going back to matter, the spirit, mind, reason, continuing on toward good; the law, spirit, God, one and the same, eternal, the soul of things, from which I am an individual entity, my demands, God's commands; he ever in the advance, I ever following. I would not overtake Thee, and master all thy truth, know all that thou knowest, for then there would be nothing for me to learn, and one of us would be lost in life other. Therefore, O Gracious Soul of all things, I pray Thee, ever to be in the van, unfolding infinite wisdom. Let us ever follow, ever continue the study of thy truths.

"And called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.—Gen. 1 : 5."

We have here clearly, night and day, evening and morning, showing beyond a doubt, that creation began in darkness and confusion, ending in light and order; beginning in the spirit, and ending in form in matter, substance, that is, spirit took form, vast and crude,—the world a positive frame-work of minerals, out of which came all the divisions and subdivisions in nature.

We also find from the above quotations, that at the conclusion of the first day (for the reader will observe that the work began in the evening or dark), that there is yet no divisions or subdivisions, either of the heaven or the earth, or of things in the heaven or on the earth. The light called day is not sunlight, beautiful, bright, and warm, like our sun, or moon, and stars. These lights are not yet formed, that is, are not yet visible. We ask the Christian world, those ministers claim to be called of God to tell whence came this temporary light? Of what was it made? Did it it continue three full days, ages, periods, or cycles of years? Verily, man who can fix the fate of men in hell or heaven through the blood of God, ought to be able to determine the properties of this temporary light through the mind of God. Will some one of all God's ministers answer?

We claim that this light was the first rays of the heavenly bodies, rolling back the mists of primordial nature, the first gray light of early dawn; that for ages after the concretion of the matter forming this earth, that rolled in vapor or mist so dense that the rays of sunlight could not penetrate it, that light and heat condensed this mist into water, thus forming oceans, seas, lakes, and rivers, causing the dry land to appear.

First, then we find a great void or space unquestionably dark, filled with infinitesimal matter.

Second, light and heat from great planetary systems reaching into this space, driving these particles of matter into each other, together concreting.

Third, creating immense quantities of vapor or mist.

Fourth, this vapor or mist has to be absorbed by the action of light and heat.

Fifth, until this absorption is fully accomplished, the concreted matter must remain in total darkness.

"And darkness rested upon the face of the deep, and the first day was the chill, cold light—Nature's first early morn.

Here commences the divisions and subdivisions of matter—life—vegetable—forming a basis for future animated life.

"And the morning and the evening were the first day."

We will lecture in Prescott, Wisconsin, on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings, September 26th, 27th, 28th and 29th inst.

The friends in each of these places will govern their arrangements according to this notice.

Harry Bastian.

"To A. H.—We are satisfied by conclusive proof, that Harry Bastian, the dark circle medium, is a humbug; and you can be satisfied of the fact too, if you will use a match and your eyes. If you will not do this, then be humbugged, like the simple. tons of whom it is said that they prefer darkness to light. And another thing—don't bother us any more with your private notes."

We clip the above from the Boston Investigator, of September 13th.

Our old friend Seaver is, we are sorry to see, getting a little peevish. Some one has been bothering him with "private notes." Some poor skeptic, we suppose, has found by observation in Harry Bastian's seances, that there is more truth in spirit communion than Brother Seaver has ever dreamed of in his philosophy, or published in the Boston Investigator, and in the exuberance and overflowing joy of his soul has written a "private note" to his old teacher and brother informing him that it is a truth, that the soul of man is immortal. But, instead of sharing in his correspondent's joy over the good news of immortality, he goes off in a huff, as is apparent from the above quoted item, and wants his correspondent to get up a little smell of brimstone at the next seance he attends.

Well, truly, Brother Seaver runs to brimstone in his recommendations—hell fire is kept up with that material,so Christians tell us. From the recommendation we infer that when the editor of the Investigator is converted to the truth of immortality, he will swallow orthodoxy, hell and all, and scratch Lucifer matches of macamoth size, with a zest becoming an old blue bellied Presbyterian.

Premiums.

The publisher of the Illustrated Phrenological Journal is offering most liberal premiums for clubs to his popular and useful Magazine. By paying $1.00 in cash, and sending only a small number of subscribers, you can secure a first class $55.00 Grover and Baker Sewing Machine. A more liberal offer cannot be made, and the agent has great inducements to offer to the subscribers. Send your address, with stamps for postage, and you will receive specimen number and full particulars. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Mrs. Addie L. Ballou

Lectures at Farwell Hall, September 25th and 26th, on "Moral Chicago." It is a fruitful theme, and no doubt she will be greeted with a full house.

M. MILLSON the spirit artist, will be in Michigan during September.

—An honest country parson, who, in the time of a great drouth, was desired to pray for rain, answered:—"I'll willingly do it to oblige you, but it is to no purpose while the wind is in this quarter."

THOSE WHO WISH to have this paper discontinued when the time is up to which it is paid for, should notify us of that wish two weeks before such time expires, as it takes that time to get it out of the mailing machine. When an order to discontinue is given by those in arrears, remittances should be made to square up in full, including the two weeks which the paper will be mailed the subscriber after such notice is given

An Entirely New Proposition.

We now have in press, and will be ready to fill orders before this notice reaches our readers a splendid new book, entitled THE SUNDAY QUESTION, and SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE.

This work consists of 192 large, closely printed pages. It is an exhaustive review of the so-called Sunday question, and self-contradictions of the Bible. The work shows the so-called divine authority for the supposed holy day, to be the cunning device of designing priests rather than the inspiration of an Infinite God! This work, which we sell for the low price of fifty cents, and send the same free of postage on the receipt of the money, we will send to any old subscriber on receipt of seventy-five cents, together with the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL to any new subscriber on trial for three months; or, we will send the same work and the JOURNAL for three months on trial direct to a new subscriber, on the receipt of seventy-five cents. For one dollar, we will send for a new subscriber, the JOURNAL three months and the above-named book, together with that very remarkable book called LEVI'S UNFOLDINGS, or The Wonders of the Universe Revealed to Man.

We hope that every subscriber to whom we are now sending the JOURNAL will avail him or herself of this generous offer, and thus secure these books, as well as to thus aid in doubling the number of the subscribers to the JOURNAL.

Mrs. Robinson's Tobacco Antidote.

The most certain and perfectly harmless antidote for the poisonous effects, and remedy for the tobacco appetite, is known by the above name.

It is compounded by Mrs. A. H. Robinson, the celebrated medium of Chicago, while entranced by a celebrated chemist, long in spirit life. This antidote is warranted to break the habit of using tobacco by the inveterate lover of the weed, when the directions (on each box) are followed.

Agents for selling the same throughout the country are wanted. For sale, wholesale and retail, at this office. Price $3.00 per box—sent by mail free of postage, on receipt of the money.

PRINCE OF MEDIUMS,

Jesus of Nazareth

BY

PAUL AND JUDAS,

Through Alexander Smyth, Medium.

This work has been read with intense interest by thousands, and is universally pronounced the most in the whole line of Spiritualistic Literature. It is the only true and reliable history of the remarkable medium called Jesus, ever written. After waiting eighteen hundred years, PAUL and JUDAS, finding the times propitious, and an excellent medium through whom to communicate, have given to the world a book of lasting interest, by taking possession of Mr. Smyth about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well-connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was, probably, no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed, that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end, and contains 319 closely-printed pages.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had its class. It is written for women; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for any body indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in that can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Oddidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:

"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

ADDRESS OF ELI F. BROWN.

Brothers and sisters, the day of superstition is rapidly drawing to a close in our country, in its stead the age of reason is upon us. With the decline of superstition, may we not hope that preaching with its impotency shall give place to a delightful season of practical work; that deeds, not words, be the work of our high calling. Not as one who preaches, but as one who prays for power to do, we come before you today in the interests of our little children's cause. Pardon us if we fail in understanding our subject, and if we tell of interest, attribute it to us, not to the subject.

THE LYCEUM CAUSE, AND LYCEUM NEEDS.

"Kind hearts are the garden,
Kind thoughts are the roots,
Kind words are the blossoms,
Kind deeds are the fruits."

It is truly said that "the present is the child of the past, the parent of the future," so the Progressive Lyceum is the beautiful and promising child of Modern Spiritualism, born in the image of spirit life, and inasmuch as it becomes the means of educating the children of our land, it shapes the destiny of our race, and is parent of the future.

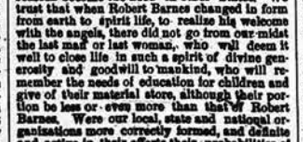
The lyceum is based upon the true principle of education, that of impartial, beautiful and natural development of the minds and bodies of our children. Its mission is to give unto earth's little ones, bright and useful lessons of wisdom and truth, to shield them from the blight of ignorance and disease, from the misfortune of false instruction, and to give unto them that purity and independence of character which will enable them to become the truest and noblest objects of human life—true and honest men and women. We can not conceive then of a more important subject to claim the attention of reformers, than this educational movement, of which idea the progressive lyceum is the expression. What are its vital needs? How may we best supply these wants that its grand mission be fulfilled? How may we do the greatest good to the largest number of these little ones on whom the great future of reform depends? These and kindred questions seem to us to be of most vital and significant importance to reformers.

The subject of education aside from all reforms or religious movements, is of itself one of the greatest import connected with the human family and the world's progress. Liberal education of the masses is the broad road that leads to a brighter and more peaceful future, to a wiser, happier, and purer form of civilization and enlightment. The progress and perpetuity of our free institutions depend upon the patriotism, the knowledge and moral independence of our boys and girls; the health and vigor of the human family rests upon their proper physical development; in fact, the success of all reforms whether social, political or religious, depends upon their unbiased education, upon their physical and mental strength and moral purity.

Education being of itself so important, how much more so does it become when we recognize in it one of the most powerful auxiliaries in our endeavor to reform the religious institutions of our land, and to establish in their stead a pure, sensible and natural religion? All religious denominations recognize the intimate relation, that the education of their children bears to the successful promulgation of their religious ideas. Knowing this, they act with the most watchful diligence in this respect, and make the Sabbath school the fold into which they draw the largest possible number of children, into whose minds they instill their peculiar doctrines with most zealous care. This manner of work forms the fruitful source from which they fill their lagging ranks in after years. "As the twig is bent the tree inclines," and those of us who have passed through this schooling, know the struggle it cost us to rid our minds of the lessons there taught us. In illustration of this, we find there is no more powerful religious denomination than the Catholic. Mark what it says of the matter; "Give us the first ten years of a child's life, and we ask no more." So potent is the effort of this church, so susceptible and retentive is the mind of the child, that from its first ten year's development under their care, that its whole after life is given in devotion to their cause. But more, these Catholics are not satisfied with Sunday schools and Sunday influences alone, but they regard their children as worthy of especial and exclusive week day schools, under the vigilance of the chosen guardians of their faith. It is needless for us to speak of their successful influence as a denomination, and the conformity and servitude of their children through life, for there is not a village, town, city, or country will in this free America, but already feels too well their mighty power. The Sabbath school is the chosen and legitimate institution with all denominations, but not satisfied with this, we see, and feel the encroachment of orthodoxy upon our free school system. Our school books teem with the nature of their ideas; our juvenile readers and children's literature are stagnant with their dogmas; the devotional exercises in our common schools teach their doctrines; the bible in the public schools is held there by their power, and receives its construction at their hands; orthodox School Boards sit in judgment upon the application of teachers, to the rejection of the liberal and the appointment of those sound in the faith; and we stand face to face with the last daring, yet contemptible act of the promulgators of orthodoxy in their effort to rob the constitution of our country of its dearest guarantee—religious liberty. Shall this subject of education longer pass unheeded by our people? Shall Orthodoxy and Catholicism do more for their children than Spiritualism for hers? Shall we leave one opportunity unused, or one need unsupplied in aid of the Progressive Lyceum movement, which aims to correct and reform the whole subject of education?

We do not favor sectarianism as a principle in connection with any religion, much less so in connection with this beautiful philosophy of life for the establishment of which we labor. We favor no creed, no set form of belief, no catechism of questions and answers to hand ready made to children. Such is not the mission nor intention of the lyceum. While it aims to present truth in all its forms, and to give a correct idea of the laws of life, it guarantees the broadest liberty of opinion, and proposes to establish education upon the true principle of causing thought, and intends to better the conceptions of true religion by teaching boys and girls men and women to cease to do wrong because it is wrong, and to do right because it is right. But human society is at present so constituted that organization and formality in this work are an absolute necessity, and in the lyceum we behold that system in its least objectionable form. We look upon the Lyceum as a part of the great movement of Modern Spiritualism, inseperable from it, but its distinctive province is to look to the proper care and instruction of children. The Sunday school holds this relation to prevailing religions, and what it is to the waning influence of orthodoxy, we must make the Lyceum to the establishment of our ideas. Whether this is so in principle or not, it is so from necessity. If we would undo the errors of the churches, and do all the good they leave undone, we must have system and organization, the ways and the means. The Lyceum is put in our hands to become a counter-balance to the efforts of Sunday schools, and we must use it until the whole system of Sabbath schools, mission schools, and public schools shall become so far reformed and improved, that they will be conducted upon correct principles, and cease to be sectarian. It is time then that Spiritualists were more aroused to the importance of this work. But as all our National Conventions heretofore the subject has received but a few hour's attention, and has been passed by. But this will not longer do. The needs of the hour are urgent, the Lyceum Mission is at hand, and it demands attention. All those who care aught for Spiritualism, for reform, for education, for their children, have an interest in the work, and all who have hands, or hearts, or brains, or money, or influence, can and ought to aid it. The needs of this movement, we claim, stand out before us as the most important subject to claim our attention, let us find these wants, and having found them, let us do all we can to furnish the ways and means of supply.

The needs of a movement are most evident from those things which hinder its making a correct start, and from those causes which produce its failures. In examining the Lyceum movement, then, we may ask the questions: Has it made the right start? Is it at work to the best advantage? Is it equal to its mission? Do Lyceums fail, if so, why? The Lyceum as a cause is in its beginning, it is a mere child; scarcely ten years have passed since its conception from the spirit world, yet it has already done much, even wonderful. There are at this time something less than a hundred lyceums at work, and thousand of boys and girls are enjoying its blessed privileges. This is encouraging, yet for every single Lyceum now in operation, there needs to be a hundred, and instead of less than a hundred, all told, we should have ten thousand. The mission of the movement is so broad that it is as natural, yes, as universal as that of its parent cause. Looking at it in this broad sense, its greatest need is that of correct, general organization. Organization, harmonious in its workings, systematic, all-powerful and eternal, is the soul creative principle of nature itself. In the affairs of men proper organization is the fundamental basis which underlies the success of every enterprise; the stability of governments rests upon it. The success of armies depends upon it; and the security of society finds in organization its greatest safeguard. Precision of purpose, unity of action and discipline, will win when numbers fail, for "in unity there is strength," in divisions weakness. Our Lyceum cause has not this general organization. There is no means by which one Lyceum can co-operate with another; no means by which a general support of Lyceums can be maintained, no provision for the support of general missionaries. In fact there is no distinct form of organization which has for its one great purpose the welfare of our children's cause. Can the movement then attain to its greatest influence? Can it be the single exception to all reforms that needs no general association? From the very nature of its proposed work, and from its apparent inability to fulfill its mission, we know that this cannot be.



In what manner does the cause need a general organization? It is plain to all who are acquainted with our movement, that it needs a large number of the right kind of workers; that it needs missionaries who understand the purpose of the Lyceum and who appreciate its beautiful design, and possess the ability to do the work that needs to be done. The cause needs more life and strength; it needs money; it needs more suitable literature for children; it needs aid and encouragement in many ways which it must receive before it can accomplish its purpose. The object and need of a general organization is to supply these wants, to develop all our available resources, that all who can and will give of their money, their influence, their time, their labor will give freely. This general association will form a center of action, a body of men and women who can take all these resources and effect a unity of purpose and a concert of action. This is necessary in order that our combined efforts may be directed intelligently, with a strong will, with such a definite purpose that our power will be felt all over our land in support of lyceums now at work, and in the successful building up of new ones. Our cause has no such organization as this; its great mission cannot be fulfilled without it, hence its need.

The Sunday school cause is organized in the most efficient manner in many parts of the country. Its influence pervades all portions of our land; not a cross-road's church or school house; not an empty mill or other available building but has its Sunday school. In many of our States we find county Sabbath school associations in which all orthodox denominations join. These societies have their missionaries who look after their interests into every nook and corner of their districts. In the large cities we find similar institutions in the mission Sunday schools which gather from the by-streets, the alleys, the gutters and from dens of vice, thousands of little, poor, neglected souls into their folds. These organizations hold their county, state and national conventions. They give not only hours, but days and weeks to these meetings, and these gatherings are characterized by a zeal, a quickening of spirit and a devotion to their work, that we might well strive to emulate. This is organization and its results, and is what we think our cause needs.

We have no war with this great effort of the churches in behalf of the children. God speed them in their labor, for it has done good in the past and may do more in the future. The plan of their work, and the nature of their doctrines, are undergoing radical changes, and still greater modifications must and will be made by them in answer to the demand that the progress of ideas is making of them. May still more light and common sense be given them in this respect. But we feel that we have something better to give them in the Progressive Lyceum,—a higher form of education, one better adapted to the mind and heart of the child, such as will cause it to grow into a healthier and wiser manhood and womanhood. More than this, we feel in the lyceum the inspiration of Divinity; that through it earth's poor and unlearned can look up to brighter hopes and better ways, and angels can reach down their loving influence to guard and teach our little children. "Order is heaven's first law," and it is for this reason that proper co-operation is essential, for it is only by harmonious effort and purpose that we can come in rapport with the powers around and above us.

In our several years experience as a conductor, and in our recent efforts as a Lyceum Missionary, we have found that the best means of success in a lyceum is order and co-operation. This will be found true of every lyceum, and being true of them individually, how much more so must it be true of them collectively, or as a movement.

The further need of a more definite and active form of organization, in the whole cause of Modern Spiritualism, as well as in that educational department represented by the Lyceum, is remarkably evident in the present condition of affairs in Indiana. The rich bequest of over half a million dollars left to the Spiritualists of that State, by the generous will of Robert Barnes, for the establishment of an educational institution for their children, places upon the Spiritualists of that State, a work and a responsibility which nothing but the most judicious management can perform in keeping with the beautiful idea of the giver, and for the best interests of all those who shall receive its benefits. In this case a large sum of money is left to the trustees of the Indiana State Association of Spiritualists, for especial purposes, to be used for the benefit of a particular class of children and people. A judicious outlay of money is necessary, buildings are to be erected, and an educational institution established and conducted. All this needs to be wisely done. Yet it cannot be so performed without a unity of purpose and action on the part of all the Spiritualists of that State, and a devotion to the work on the part of those to whom the trust is made, and upon whom its execution devolves. Proper state and local organization is a necessity now in Indiana, and may we not hope and expect that what is the need in that State may for similar reasons become the need in other States. We trust that when Robert Barnes changed his form from earth to spirit life, to realize his welcome with the angels, there did not go from our midst the last man or last woman, who will deem it well to close life in such a spirit of divine generosity and goodwill to mankind, who will remember the needs of education for children and give of their material store, although their portion be less or even more than that of Robert Barnes. Were our local, state and national organizations more correctly formed, and definite and active in their efforts their probabilities of aid would be greatly enof this world

there be and aid

Our children's cause needs first of all a good general organization. Lyceums experience other wants that are imperative in their nature. Why do lyceums fail? Why are not more lyceums started? Could these two questions be fully answered, we could thereby arrive at the vital needs of lyceums. Lyceums do fail, never from any fault of the children, but always principally from lack of workers who possess both the willingness and ability to do. If there are good workers in a lyceum,—those who appreciate its design and importance—who are willing and anxious to put forth their best efforts,—who are capable of doing what is to be done, there will be no lack of interest, no want of material aid, no scarcity of children, in fact no failure! Success or failure in a lyceum is the effect of which its workers and managers are the cause. Lyceum workers are few, too few in every lyceum Many even of those who are willing zealous leaders and officers, fail because they do not appreciate, or comprehend the nature of the work they are trying to perform; they lack information, and a knowledge of how to use that which they possess. In order to use that has come under our knowledge has there been a sufficient number of suitable persons to fill all the places of leaders and officers hence some posts of importance have to be filled with incompetent persons, which augure failure from the beginning. Lyceum workers fail because they do not possess the means of interesting the children. They lack a fruitful knowledge of familiar and interesting subjects. They need a practical knowledge of the proper methods of instruction. The children are not taught to tell their own story, to coin their own thoughts, leaders fail to practice the true principle of development; that of growth from within. They make too little effort to avoid routine and sameness, give too little thought to the nature of their work, to do it make success a study.

In our Lyceums we talk upon subjects too old for the children, enter into discussions of no interest to them, meet too many religious questions, all of which is a waste of precious lyceum moments, and fails to bring us nearer together, or prepare us for the work in which we are engaged. We spend time upon these matters to the neglect of the simplest yet most useful, the richest yet the wisest lessons of life, such as even the mind of a child can grasp, and the consideration of which in a child like spirit would interest and benefit all.

Because of failure our Lyceum workers experience urgent needs, one of which is that of a more extensive and suitable children's literature. We need whole libraries of juvenile books full of interest for children, full of good sensible thoughts, and free from the errors of theology that poison ninety-nine hundredths of all the children's books extant. Our Lyceums as well as the millions of children out side of them need a wide-spread, wholesome juvenile literature. This would supply one of the wants our leaders now feel.

The failure of lyceums makes another need evident. That is the means by which individuals may become qualified to be Lyceum workers. Our leaders need the benefit of especial normal instruction. But this is perhaps beyond their reach, hence they need the next best thing which is this—that every one of the good strong, well informed minds of our spiritual lecture ranks take hold of this work, go into the lyceum, become leaders of the groups of large boys and girls, that they who must soon become the men and women of the cause, shall have a correct idea of the work before them, and be able and strong to perform it. Our Lyceums do fail, our few workers in them grow weak and give out, but let us not put the blame on these noble ones who have made the effort and have not succeeded, but let the responsibility rest most heavily upon those who know their duty but fail to do it. Those who think too much of their case, their money, of what people will say, and into whose minds and hearts the love of children, the necessities of the poor and ignorant, the desire to do good and be of some use in the world, have not entered with sufficient force to arouse them to labor. If our lyceums and their cause are not all to-day we would have them, it is because the drones of our spiritual hive will not help the busy bees.

Another sad reason for the failure of lyceums is that those who undertake the management of them, cannot agree. They will not work together harmoniously and unselfishly, and by strong co-operation one with another, all laboring for the good of one common end, make the Lyceum a grand success. Envy, jealousy, clique, party spirit and desire for leadership rob the lyceum of its life. In many, we can say, in most cases, in which lyceums have been suspended, these unmanly feelings have been the blights which have stung it to death. Alas! for lyceums, that this cause of failure exists; yet it does exist, and from this fact demonstrates the great need of more of the right kind of workers, shows that we need a higher conception of our labor, that we need broader views, need to become so unselfishly wise, that we shall stand and act above contention and suspicion.

Our Lyceums become discouraged from lack of acquaintance one with another. They need to be kept all aglow with a wholesome spirit of emulation and fellowship. Our Lyceums to-day are scattered over our land hundreds of miles apart, each one fighting single handed for life against the combined efforts of orthodoxy; for this reason they all lack that encouragement, and that appreciation of their own importance which is due to them, and which is necessary for their success. We need some means by which Lyceums can co-operate in interest. For this reason our ranks should be increased a hundred fold, for the mission of our cause is no small and so important, and that a host of workers is needed. Lyceums could then be sustained and a large number of new ones inaugurated.

All these necessities of the Lyceum movement concentrate themselves into one great material want—the all-powerful element, money. The lyceum cause with a full treasury, would have abundant workers, and lyceums would not fail. Lyceum work does not pay in point of dollars and cents. Our people have not yet arrived at such a conception of its importance as to give their money in aid of it. It is the misfortune of our cause that the money held in the control of our people, cannot be moved in behalf of the little ones. Alas! That with Spiritualists money is so dear, and children's souls so cheap! There are those who are willing and competent to labor in the lyceum cause, who cannot from lack of means. They are willing to sacrifice the endearments of home, to give their time to be spent for the good of others. These persons deserve decent pay; even angels if in this earthly form, must have bread and butter. Our cause has not yet become so popular or divine that homes, clothing and bread come masked to its workers, but this brazen age or greenback age, pinches them as hard, and as often as any other class of people. Our presence has not yet become so precious, that railroads furnish us free transportation, or that hotels cease to charge for accomodations. Yet our cause must have workers if it be a success, and if these laborer perform the service money is their need and their due.

The Protestant and Catholic adherents pour out their treasure, and pile up immense churches and temples at the cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars in single instances. The demands of priesthood are met with thousands of dollars from the hard earned savings of their flocks. Theological schools receive immense fortunes. Foreign missions, the publications of Bible Societies, the deluge of orthodox tracts that flood our country, all involve the expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars, yet this is for their cause, and money does it all. Shall we think, then, that money is not one of the greatest needs of ours? If the mission of our cause is to correct the nature of their work, to benefit mankind by undoing their errors, and doing that which they leave undone, we need to have our army of workers increased a thousand fold, and our cause needs money, millions upon millions of dollars.

Another material want that is felt by our cause is that of halls and places for meetings. Nothing else gives so much independence as a reasonable resource of real estate. We do not need costly edifices such as orthodoxy builds for its good, but we need useful, substantial, beautiful halls. Buildings of this description are springing up all over our country remarkably fast, yet we need more. Not a society or lyceum need be long without a hall by using energy and enterprise. It is a bright season in the future to anticipate, at which time, lyceums all over our country will have halls of becoming size and appearance, beautiful by art, supplied with libraries of good books, with laboratories for scientific pursuits, with music, with apparatus for physical culture, with all the means of amusement and culture that good sense and liberality can provide. Halls for Lyceum and Spiritual purposes, unpolluted by bigotry or any of its kindred vices, but magnetized with the highest angel ministry and inspiration. We need such halls as these, but if they are yet beyond our reach, let us have the best we can get. A lyceum will scarcely fail in a suitable hall well provided with means of interest for children.

Until our cause can have proper general organization, have an army of workers, have money and halls placed at its command, it can never attain great power and influence. Yet it seems to us that all these outward necessities rest upon the great essential spiritual want that we feel. We all need a higher appreciation of our work, need to comprehend more fully its significant importance and its universal mission of good to humanity. The remedy for this is that we be thoroughly awakened, that our minds and hearts be quickened with live coals from off the altar of devotion and sacrifice; that we band ourselves more closely together and work more zealously, intelligently, and determinedly. We need to become braver men and nobler women, who are men and women under all circumstances, who are willing and able to know and do the right, no matter how hard the work, how poor the pay, how great the immediate cost. Such a spirit of devotion and sacrifice as this is the price of all reform. Did we but have it, all other wants would be supplied.

We have no fear for the final success of reform,—it will come as surely as the bright morning succeeds the night, for there is no power on earth below nor in heaven above that can impede its progress. Bigotry, priesthood, and false systems of religion, politics, of society and education, must disappear before its onward march. The Lyceum has its part in this great movement, and of its final success we are equally sure. Do not think that we regard the Lyceum as a failure—far from it. It is not the final success of the cause that is the burden of our mind, but it is the immediate needs of the movement which we ask you to consider. These necessities become more urgent every hour, as we struggle to attain supremacy over opposition and difficulties. It is an answer to the cry that comes to us from every direction—give us aid, we want workers, we want books, we want to know how to interest and instruct our children. It is in behalf of those Lyceums whose life has failed, on behalf of those now hard at work single handed for existence, in behalf of those localities and societies in every part of our land which desire to build up lyceums; it is for the advancement of our cause throughout the South, for the far West, the East and the North; for the countless poor and ignorant in our large cities, for the millions of children everywhere, for reasons higher yet even these, that we ask this body to consider a few of the needs of our children's cause.

AN ENIGMA.

A Maryland Negro Puzzles The Doctors—He Declares That Fire Has No Effect upon His flesh—He Eats Melted Lead, and Handles With Bare Hands Red-Hot Iron.

EASTON, Talbot Co., Md., August, 1871.—The magician may, surrounded with the thousand appliances, both mechanical and chemical, necessary to the successful operation of that calling, perform feats that startle the beholder, and seem to the uninitated as controverting well established philosophical laws. Indeed, to such perfection have they brought their feats of legerdemain that their doings are in many instances truly wonderful; but, after you have looked in amazement at the tricks of a sleight-of-hand performer, you leave his presence—in fact, you know, while wondering at their execution, that they are the fruits of education, and can be explained upon natural principles.

It is my intention, however, to detail in the following lines an instance, recently coming under my own observation, where most wonderful performances have taken place that seem to entirely set at defiance well established natural laws, and furnish the most —instances where the exhibition and performer have been stripped of all the drapery of magical appliances and education, and where the principles of legerdemain do not furnish a practical solution of the feats accomplished.

FRUITFUL SOURCE FOR SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Business recently called me to the eastern shores of Maryland, to the point from which we write, the county seat of Talbot county. While there I heard from several gentlemen of prominence the story of the negro blacksmith who lived in an adjoining county, upon whom fire had no effect whatever. The story was so incredible that I gave it little heed, although it came from most reliable sources, and was related to me by gentlemen of the highest standing in the community for honor and integrity.

A day or two after I first heard of

THE REMARKABLE NEGRO,

Mr. T. R. Robson, editor of the Eastern Star, called at my room, and stated that the negro was in town, and that the physicians were going to make an examination of him at the office of Dr. P. Stack, and invited me to witness the operations, which I very gladly did.

Mr. R bson and myself went at once to Dr. Stack's office, where were assembled Drs. Anderson, Goldsborough, and Comegys, of Easton; Mr. J. A. Johnson, editor of the Journal at Easton; Mr. A. A. Pancoult, and Mr. John C. Henry, all prominent citizens of Talbot county.

A brisk fire of anthracite coal was burning in a common coal stove, and an iron shovel was placed in the stove and heated to a white heat. When all was ready, the negro pulled off his boots and placed the hot shovel upon the soles of his feet, and kept it there until the shovel became black. His feet were then examined by the physicians, but and all declared that no evidence of a heated substance having come in contact with them was visible.

The shovel was again heated red-hot, taken from the stove and handed to him. He ran out his tongue as far as he could, and laid the heated shovel upon it, licking the iron until it became cooled. The physicians examined the tongue, but found nothing to indicate that he had suffered in the least from the heated iron.

A large handful of common squirrel-shot, procured from a store near Dr. Stack's office, was next placed in an iron receptacle and heated until melted. The negro then took the dish, and then put it into his mouth, allowing it to run all around his teeth and gums. He repeated the operation several times, each time keeping the melted lead in his mouth until solidified. After each operation the physicians examined him carefully, but could find nothing upon his flesh to indicate that he had been in the least affected by the substance he had been handling. After the performances with the lead he deliberately put his hand into the stove, in which was a very hot fire, took therefrom a handful of hot coals and parsed them around the room to the gentlemen present, keeping them in his hand some time. Not the slightest evidence of a burn was visible upon his hand after he threw the coals back into the stove.

POURED THE HEATED LEAD INTO THE PALM OF HIS HAND,

The exhibition was regarded by all who witnessed it as most remarkable, for there was no opportunity for

THE PRACTICE OF CHICANERY.

Every gentleman present was there for the purpose of detecting, if possible, any trick—if trick there was—and none could have had the least interest in aiding or abetting the negro in his performances. Whatever solution may be had of this matter, there can be no doubt but that this negro handles fire in the manner set forth above, without the use of any mechanical or chemical appliances whatever, for he has been possible, not only at the time specified by me, but at several other times and places, and in the presence of some of the first men in the State of Maryland.

In addition to the case cited, which came under my own observation, I will state that in April last, while the judges of this judicial circuit were holding court at Denton, Caroline county—the county in which this man lives—Judges Wickes and Stump, accompanied by Sheriff Richardson, went to the blacksmith shop of this negro, which is situated about six miles from Denton, on the farm of W. P. Richardson. The Sheriff made known to him the object of their visit, when, in the language of the Judges, "he performed such as handling red-hot iron with his bare hands, forging it into shape without the use of tongs, putting it upon his tongue, etc., etc."

At a later period he was visited at his shop by Dr. C. E. Tarr, editor of the Denton Journal; J. Marion Emerson, editor of the American Union; James B. Stats, T. H. Keene, Clerk of the Court; R. J. Jump, late State Comptroller of the treasurer; Col. R. D. Carter, and Dr. P. O. Cherbonnier. These gentlemen came upon him wholly unawares, and when requested by them to perform some of the feats he has become so famous for in this locality, he immediately went through with

THE SAME WONDERFUL PERFORMANCES

I have mentioned. I have conversed with a great number of the people who have seen him, gentlemen of education and integrity, all of whom declare that they do not believe that fire has the least effect upon his flesh.

After he had concluded his performances in Dr. Stack's office, I sought an opportunity to converse with him. I found him very ignorant, not able to read or write, and in all respects

AN UNADULTERATED NEGRO.

His name is Nathan Coker, and he is about fifty-eight years of age. He was born in the town of Hillsborough, Caroline county, Maryland, and was the slave of Henry L. Sellers of that place, by whom he was sold to Bishop Emory. In relation to his ability to handle fire, and how he first became aware of it, he said:

"Boss, when I was about thirteen years old, old Mass. Emory hired me out to a lawyer whose name was Purnell. He treated me badly, and did not give me enough to eat. I shied around the kitchen one day, and when the cook left, I shot in, dipped my hand into the dinner-pot, and pulled out

A RED-HOT DUMPLING.

The boiling water did not burn, and I could eat the hot dumpling without winking. So after that I often got my dinner that way. I has often got the hot fat off the boiling water and drank it. I drink my coffee when it is boiling, and it does not give me half so much pain as it does to drink a glass of cold water. I always likes it just as hot as I can get it."

I then interrogated him as to the effect heated substances had upon his flesh, and asked him when he handled them with his hands if he did not suffer more than when he took them inwardly, to which he replied:

"No, Boss, I often take my iron out of the forge with my hand when red hot,

BUT IT DON'T BURN.

Since I was a little boy I have never been afraid to handle fire."

He then stated that often by himself he would pick up red-hot iron because his tongs were not hands, and that he never felt any discomfort from it He felt no more harm, he said, from handling fire than stones.

I could cite a great number of instances besides those mentioned, and give the names of a large number of gentlemen of high standing, who have witnessed the wonderful doings of this untutored African, but I do not deem it necessary, as what I have stated can be more than authenticated by almost any prominent man living in this locality. I am thoroughly convinced, from personal observation, that and I am sustained in that belief by the united judgment of all gentlemen who have seen him, including a large number of physicians.

This man should be seen and examined by our scientific men, and the causes and effects of his remarkable performances duly investigated; for it is certain that his power to handle fire does exist in a remarkable degree, and that, too, without the aid of anything save what nature has bestowed

A New and Extraordinary Spiritual Phenomenon.

As progress is a universal law, extending into every department of nature, even ramifying all her interior forces, we should not be surprised to witness the occasional development of new spiritual phenomena, and the modification or modified exhibition of those phases of the manifestations with which we have been long familiar. Greater changes await the future.

A few weeks since, the nearest neighbor of the writer was killed accidentally by one of his horses. A few nights before the occurrence, at about ten o'clock, a light was seen to issue from the house, and travel in the direction of the barn, and as it moved too fast to be carried by human hands, it had to be assigned to some other agency.

The night succeeding the funeral another light was seen to enter through a second-story window into the room in which the oldest son was sleeping, and was observed by him to pass through a partition door into the adjoining room in which the weeping widow was lying on the bed in a state of almost intolerable grief; but having her eyes closed she did not observe the light. A lady friend, however, who was lying in bed with her saw it and took special notice of it. She observed that it was about four or five feet long and one foot broad. She describes it as being above the brightness of the sun, but emitting no rays. As it approached the bed, it seemed to pause for a moment at the footboard, and then turning, it gradually arranged itself directly over the weeping lady, stretching almost the entire length of her body. At this instant Mrs. Bartlett rose up in bed and commenced rubbing her hands together, exclaiming as she did so, "Oh, how changed my feelings! A few minutes ago I felt like dying with grief. I was concluding I could not live through my troubles, but now I feel real happy!"

On being asked if she had seen the light, she replied in the negative.

Now, there are three witnesses to a part and two to nearly the whole of this occurrence. The two ladies have neither of them any affinity for or faith in Spiritualism, and are ignorant of its history. Neither they nor the young man—the third witness—could have had any motive for falsifying, or, in their state of mind, any disposition for it. Here, then we have an extraordinary circumstance,—a bright light about the size of the human body, entering the upper story of a building, and arranging itself over the body of a lady in a state of great mental agony, and in some mysterious way imparting an influence so as to relieve her of her sufferings.

Comment is unnecessary. I submit the case to these learned English scientists, Mr. Crooker and Mr. Cox.

I will improve this opportunity to say to the the Western readers of the JOURNAL, that having received another appointment by the Executive Board of this State to act as Missionary for the State, my journey westward will be postponed a few weeks—probably till the first of October.

And furthermore permit me to say that having been ordained a Minister of the New Gospel, by the Indiana State Association of Spiritualists and authorized to preach, solemnize marriages, and attend funerals, I hereby give notice to all love-stricken candidates for matrimony, that if they will apply for my ministerial services in that line, I will die a Gordian knot for them which I will warrant even the grave can never dissolve or separate.

Letter from J. B. Fayette.

ED. JOURNAL:—I have had but little time to sit for paintings, get tired out during the day with business matters, head full of figures of dollars and cents; but when conditions are favorable, the time is improved, and at such times I sit and do the best I can. Have sent three paintings the past month to Washington Territory, and have six to be sent away. Possibly some of them will disappoint the recipients, but I hope not, as in such cases I feel the disappointment more keenly than they.

Since I received your letter I have been to Mooresville and visited Mrs. Andrews, the physical medium. I had a good time with the spirits during two seances. The manifestations were good. They showed hands, large and small, arms, heads and features very plain. Two were recognized, a lady and a young man. The spirits sang several pieces of music in clear, full, audible voices, and in the chorus did actually drown the piano that accompanied them. Then one male and female voice sang "The Star Spangled Banner," "Home, Sweet Home," "Down on the Swanee River," "Days of Absence," and repeated them several times. It is a very good thing the spirits have at Moravia, and is destined to do much good.

One of the spirits said during a seance that the time is fast approaching when the skeptic who visits the rooms can not leave them a skeptic, for he will receive the evidence that will brush it all away, and he will know that man lives on eternally, and here, in these rooms, is the mighty truth demonstrated from day to day.

STARTLING MANIFESTATIONS.

Letter from H. S. Johnson.

BROTHER JONES:—I have been to the home of the Willis family to investigate and learn the truth in regard to the strange proceedings said to have taken place there. We found them honest country people, as near as we could judge. Mrs. Willis is a Methodist, and a very honest, exemplary woman, so say the neighbors. Mr. Willis was formerly a professor of religion, and still believes the devil has power to throw stones, and do many other wonderful things. We were there Tuesday, August 22nd. The Sunday previous two hundred people were there to witness the phenomena of stones coming into the house without the aid of mortal hands. They had not ceased to come in at intervals, when we were there.

I saw a letter that was formed on the young girl's arm and heard their account of the phenomena, which was, that stones were thrown onto the stove, and all around the house. Finally, Mrs. Willis the mother of the young girl, said she would not believe it was spirits unless they would move the stove, which was a large cook stove. No sooner had she said this, and turned her back to go into the other room, than the stove was moved about six inches, the first time we were there it had been moved seven different times, and we have heard of its being moved since then.

A chair and padlock that had hung behind the door, were thrown across the room. A lamp chimney was taken from the lamp and hid under the feather bed. The razor was partly taken from its case and thrown across the room; it fell at the feet of a lady. The latch on the bed room door—the door opened into the bed room and was open at the time—was taken off and carried through the front room, and hit the door that opened into the kitchen. The three women heard whistling, much louder than common whistling, and it frightened them. They looked to see where it came from, but could see nothing.

The girl set a pail of berries on the table; it was taken off and set on the floor without spilling a berry. A large lid to the chimney without breaking it. The looking-glass was moved from its usual position and left hanging by the cords. A stone was laid upon the bible. Mrs. Willis sat down to read the bible, when a shower of pins and buttons fell around her. An old rusty pair of shears flew across the room and fell at her feet. She picked up the shears in anger, and threw them inside the stove. Up to this time nothing had been done to injure or destroy property. The shears laid in the stove four days, when they flew out and hit Mrs. Willis without hurting her—between the shoulders, on the back, as she was standing outside the kitchen door, in the open air.

After this they found various articles cut. Their hat ribbons were cut; Mr. Willis' cap was cut; bed quilts, pillow cases, dresses, and a book-case were cut. These cuts appear to have been done with a very sharp instrument.

They took their hats and locked them in the bureau, and hid the key, so the power, whatever it might be, could not cut them. When they went for the keys, they could not find it themselves. After awhile, it dropped down in front of Mrs. Willis. A comb was taken from the girl's hair, and her hair was tied in many knots in a moment's time. Mrs. Willis' little patty cake thus were carefully set to the tune, and many other little laughable things were done.

The girl would probably be one of the best physical mediums of the present age if she could have proper development, but they are very ignorant and willful, and declare it is all the work of the devil, and they will not have a spiritual circle in the house.

Spring Lake, Wis., Sept. 8th, 1871.

We append the following extract from a paper published at Spring Lake:

STONE-THROWING AT PINE LAKE.

Since writing the article that appeared in our columns last week, we have been on the premises, and made as thorough an examination as we were able, under the circumstances. The family informed us that the stone-throwing still continued—in fact one stone came into the room about ten o'clock at night while some of our party were in the house waiting for developments.

The manifestations are assuming a new form now, various articles of wearing apparel being cut or torn in a very peculiar and unaccountable manner. The family look worn and jaded, and we wonder they do not vacate the premises for a time and see whether a change for the better will not take place.

Hundreds of people have visited the premises for the purpose of investigating the matter, and have gone away no wiser than they came. We confess that after a patient, and, as we believe, searching examination of several hours, we came away no wiser than we went. It will not do for people to pronounce it a humbug, as some have done, until they first investigate it and can demonstrate that such is a fact. There is a mystery connected with it that needs a solution at the hands of some competent person, if such can be found.

Letter from Dr. A. B. Severance.

DEAR JOURNAL:—Myself and wife have just returned from a two day's grove meeting at Geneseo, Wisconsin, and have come home to engage in the active duties of life, feeling that we have been made better by meeting with so many sweet souls that are so deeply interested in the welfare of the human race. I never attended a meeting where all were so united in the one grand object, harmony and mutual benefit. So many soul-stirring words and sentiments by the different speakers, which were, Mr. E. Stevens, of Janesville, and J. O. Barrett, our worthy State Missionary, and Mrs. J. H. Severance.

These good speakers lecture more upon practical subjects than formerly, which I consider a mark of progress.

Mr. Stevens has done a good work at Waukesha and Geneseo, and in fact, in Southern Wisconsin. May he be amply sustained by friends of freedom and progress.

But I think we have one of the best State Missionary workers in J. O. Barrett. His gentlemanly deportment, and logical and practical discourses, make him very popular with the people, besides being an indefatigable worker. He says so many encouraging words to other speakers, assists them into the field of work; while he himself is laying up "earth treasures," he will be abundantly blessed in the "life beyond." I feel that the friends every where in the state should co-operate with him.

We also met Dr. Dodge and wife, of Palmyra. He was at one time a very popular Universalist clergyman, but being a man of progressive ideas, he preached too liberal for the church creed, and now they have turned him out, shoulder upon him, as they did upon Barrett, Fishback, Rowland Conners and others. But the angels are with him, and he is now a practicing physician by the sedatance—very successful. He also has the inspiration to teach the people to "come up higher."

His wife possesses a very high order of mediumship as a psychometrist. They are about to travel in Northern Iowa and elsewhere, and it will be for the interests of all to give these worthy friends your patronage.

Here in Milwaukee there is an undercurrent of Spiritualism that is making rapid progress, yet, as in organization we are weak. Meetings every where are active there, and the angels are removing bigotry, superstition and prejudice, and the dear JOURNAL most ably sustains them.

FUNERAL OBSEQUIES.

Discourse of Mrs. Dr. Severance, Delivered at the Funeral of Henry Tew.

[Reported for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL by H. Showerman.]

In Brookfield, Wisconsin, Sept. 17th, the spirit of Henry Tew passed from its earthly temple, aged 68 years.

Brother Tew embraced Spiritualism fifteen years ago, and sustained by this faith he met the charge, not only calmly, but was impatient to go. He had been a resident of this place for thirty years, was respected as a neighbor and citizen, yet the friends of the departed were refused the use of the only church in the place, in which to hold the funeral services—which were held in a school-house.

A discourse was delivered by Mrs. Dr. Severance, of Milwaukee, one of the points of which I subjoin and wish you to publish. She said:

We have met together this morning,—not as a band of mourners, but to celebrate the birth of a spirit from earthly to spiritual existence. We have not been permitted to meet in a building dedicated to the worship of God, but we meet here in this temple dedicated to human education and improvement,—a more fitting place for liberal minds to congregate,—as through the influence of education alone, may we hope to so develop humanity, that instead of spending their strength and means as they now do, in building temples and altars to an unknown God, they will build them dedicated to humanity—not too sacred to be used for any purpose that will tend to the welfare and improvement of the human soul.

But, friends, do not blame, but rather pity these brothers of ours, because their minds are so clouded with prejudice and bigotry as to shut out the natural kindness that ever proffers the heart of sympathy to the suffering and bereaved, and strives by every possible means to render the burdens less heavy to bear, instead of adding thereto. We can afford to bear some persecution, when we have so much to comfort and sustain us, for to the Spiritualist death is shorn of its terrors, and although the tear will flow, and the heart throb with anguish at being separated from the forms of loved ones, even if they leave us for a sojourn of years across the Atlantic, so, knowing we do not the land whither they have fled, it does not entirely take from us the pain of parting; but we are confident of the existence of their spirit after they leave the form of clay,—a knowledge of more value to us than all the riches and glory of earth.

"Without the proof of immortality that we obtain from spirits, we have none whatever of any after life, and that man does not live to-day, who believes not in Spiritualism, who does not have his hours of doubts and fears."

She then read some extracts from Robert Dale Owen's remarks at the funeral of his wife, showing that in conversing with them, he had learned of the anxiety and doubts in the minds of several ministers of the gospel, of a future life when the hour approached to try their faith.

"There is not a human soul throbbing with the agony of separation from loved ones; there is not a mother when the arms of her darling child inclasps from her neck, and she sees its form laid away in its narrow bed; there is not a husband or wife whose heart if torn from its counterpart and bleeding from every pore; nor a child left motherless to battle with the cold world alone, but would be filled with thanksgiving, could they know these dear ones still lived and loved them as of old—still felt an interest in them, and they could at times clasp their hands, press them to their hearts, and feel that they would soon be with them, united in the same family, in the home preparing by their good works here in the blest hereafter, where they will meet them at the river's edge with outstretched arms, encircling them as a fond mother clasps her weary child to her rest-giving bosom. Yes, my friends, 'Death is a kind and welcome servant, who unlocks with noiseless hand Life's flower-encircled door, to show us those we love,' and while there is a sound of mourning here, there are tones of rejoicing there.

"The friend and brother, whose remains lie before us, has left children here who will feel his absence, and has met children and wife there, who until, with work for those here,—will feel for you in all troubles and afflictions, and rejoice with you in all good works. When we look upon the shrouded form before us, we feel in our souls he is not there.

"'Not there? Where then is he?
The form we used to see
Was but the garment that he used to wear.
The grave mold that will press
Upon that cast off dress;
Is but his wardrobe locked:—he is not there.'

"He has passed on to a higher stage of life. Earthly life is the primary school of man's development, where he is preparing to enter a more advanced class, and if he learn well these rudimental lessons, he can go on happy and rejoicing; but if he go hence before thus prepared, it is a great misfortune, for as a student can not go on in an academic course without first the rudimental, but must be sent back into the primary department; so the spirit must learn the lessons pertaining to earthly life, upon the earth. This is the reason we have so many undeveloped spirits influencing so many of our mediums at the present time.

"What is there in the beautiful doctrine of Spiritualism that is so repulsive to the church-es? It is based in the Bible, and accounts are given of spirit's presence at many different points,—and it comes as a response to the unuttered pages of humanity.

"Is there anything in it tending to immorality? Certainly not. Believing as we do that every wrong we commit, every good work that we fail to do, every evil desire or emotion, will mar the beauty of our spirits, and bring us unavoidable suffering that no power in the heavens or on the earth can atone for a single sin we commit, would certainly have all possible restraining power, while every good work, every kindly word or deed, every act of raising the fallen, comforting the mourner, bettering the condition of any soul, will help make us a heaven here and hereafter.

"We make our own heavens and our own hells by our lives. Believing this, we certainly have every inducement to be good and true.

"We must recollect when persecuted and maligned, that other martyrs to their faith have suffered worse. Eighteen hundred years ago, a babe was worshiped by those who shut their church in our faces, had not where to lay his head; and were he here to-day, living as he lived, eating and drinking with publicans and sinners, every church door in the land would be closed against him, and if he spake, it would have to be from a school-house or the street.

"When we think of the persecution of Socrates and the great philosophers of the past, whose great merit and wisdom we glory in to-day, we can afford to wait for the world to be sufficiently developed to appreciate the beautiful doctrines we know to be true.

"I need not eulogize the character of him whose spirit has passed on before, but whose ashes yet remain, for if thirty years daily intercourse in all the different vocations of life has not satisfied you of his integrity of character, then no words of mine,—a comparative stranger,—would do so.

"I leave his memory with you. Emulate his virtues; throw the sweet mantle of charity over his failings. Live noble, unselfish, pure lives, then will you be prepared to meet in a happy re-union all the loved ones that have gone before to the flower-gemmed fields of spirit land."

NEW YORK.

Report of the Annual Meeting of the New York State Society of Spiritualists.

[Reported for the Religio-Philosophical Journal.]

The regular Annual Convention of this organization was held pursuant to the published call of the Executive Board, in the Universalist Church, in the village of Le Roy, Genesee county, New York, on the second day of September, 1871, J. W. Seaver, the President of the organization presiding.

P. I. Clum, the Secretary, read the proceedings of the previous Annual Convention, which being found correct, were approved.

A. C. English, the Treasurer, presented his Report, which being read, was approved.

The state of the finances as reported, is as follows:

Money received from the previous Treasurer	$35.58
Annual dues from A. C. English	1.00
" B. Rhodes	2.00
" A. C. Doty	1.00
" A. V. Spaulding	1.00
The President received the following sums from Mr. Rice	5.00
" Sarah Rathbun	1.00
" A. C. Tilden	1.00
Cash on hand	$37.58

The Missionary Committee made their Annual Report, showing that Mr. and Mrs. Woodruff, the faithful missionaries, had rendered good and efficient service in the cause of Spiritualism, in the counties of Western New York, during the year, with but slight assistance from the Organization; and being about to leave this State, to continue their arduous labors in the West, a resolution of thanks for their self-sacrificing and ill remunerated labors in the employment of this organization, was offered, and passed by the unanimous vote of the Convention.

The vacancies in the Missionary Committee were filled by the election of the following:

For three years—J. W. Seaver, of Byron, Ira Bronson, of Lockport. For two years—A. C. Tilden, of Dansville, L. O. Preston, of Avon. For one year—P. I. Clum, of Rochester, A. C. English, Batavia.

The Secretary read communications received in pursuance of the public request for information relative to the local organizations, making reports, to enable this organization to appoint a proper number of delegates to the National Convention, to be held in the city of Troy, N. Y., on the 12th day of September, 1871, and the proper number of such delegates were duly appointed, with the usual power to fill vacancies.

The Committe on Nominations reported the following named persons for the respective offices, and they were elected:

President, J. W. Seaver, of Byron; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. L. M. Tuttle, of Byron, Dr. G. L. Ditson of Albany; Secretary, Lucia C. Miller, of Le Roy; Treasurer, P. I. Clum, of Rochester.

The President, on behalf of the Executive Board, made a verbal statement of the affairs of the organization, detailing its operations during the past year, and returning his thanks to the Convention for the unsolicited honor conferred upon him; spoke with much feeling and eloquence in advocacy of the sacred cause of the angels and humanity, so dear to his heart, and in which he has for so many years of sacrifice and zealous labor, rendered efficient service. Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

A Characteristic Western Letter.

ED. JOURNAL:—Inclosed, please find fifty cents, which you will please apply as follows: Send me the "Biography of Satan" as per advertisement in the JOURNAL, balance apply to the credit of those who would like to read your paper, but are unable to pay. I have long wished to read a reliable history of the miserable cuss, but I never could get hold of one I could read but one authentic history of him, and that was in Milton's Paradise Lost. I always thought that Milton drew the least bit in the world on his imagination for that. There is a devil, Mr. Editor, I know it; I can prove it. I not the Bible infallible—just as infallible as the Pope? Have I not seen, time and again, the likeness of his Satanic Majesty as a frontispiece to that same Bible? and if that is not sufficient evidence, I will quote the Irishman, and that will settle the matter. He said there must be a devil, or how could they get such correct likenesses of him. Is it satisfactory?

In take of contents, chap. 18, "The Christian's Devil—where imported or borrowed from." One might imagine, from the manner in which he is ignored by the churches at this time that they had no further use for him, or had returned him to original owners.

I have been taking the JOURNAL but a few weeks, and am better pleased with it than words can tell. When my subscription expires you will hear from me again.

You are giving old theology hard knocks, but then, Mr. Editor, theology is a "hard shell" and will require a fearful amount of pounding to break it. You are doing a grand and noble work, or perhaps I should say, assisting in that will eventually relieve mankind of the superstition, bigotry and intolerance that has weighed it down like an incubus for ages, and rake it to a higher, better and purer realm of thought and action.

Mr. Francis' "Search after God" is grand beyond all my conceptions. From my stand-point, it is unanswerable. I have only read the numbers since I subscribed for the paper. When it appears in book form, you may set me down for one copy. He will utterly annihilate that "insatiate monster,"—the god of theology (he has long been a myth, so far as my thoughts and ideas are concerned), and give us something that we can understand—more comprehend and understand. I am intensely interested in the closing of the "Search." Go on with the good work, and may the good angels guide and direct you to the fulfillment of the downfall of all error, and man for once be free indeed.

I must beg pardon for trespassing upon so much of your valuable time. I know this is a long letter, but I guess your waste basket will hold it.

Wishing you and the progressive movement in which you are engaged, abundant success, I remain, yours truly,

G. G. WALKER.

Frankfort, Kansas, Sep. 6th, 1871.

THOSE WHO WISH to have this paper discontinued when the time is up to which it is paid for, should notify us of that wish two weeks before such time expires, as it takes that time to get it out of the mailing machine. When an order to discontinue is given by those in arrears, remittances should be made to square up in full, including the two weeks which the paper will be mailed the subscriber after such notice is given Oxygen—The Ghost of Graves, Caves, and Boiltomless Pits, after which it was Named—Discovery of Oxygen, Effects of its Discovery—Recurrence to Battery Record for an Explanation of its Affinities—Oxygen a Supporter of Combustion—A Supporter of Respiration—A Vitalizer of the Blood and Sanitary Regulator of Surroundings—Significant Quotations from a Live Chemist—Major General Oxygen or Hell in Harness en route to "Heaven in Holiness" and its Triune Dual Links, Electricity, Heat and Light to be Considered.

OXYGEN being the supporter of all these phases of spontaneous combustion, such as the "Jack-a-Lantern," "Will-o'-the-wisp," and other wondrous phenomena of lowlands, mines, caves, wells and graves, was in former times supposed to be and named gas, after ghist, ghast, or ghost. The alchemist even dared not to approach the mysterious presence of the "spirits of wine," "spirits of ammonia," "spirits of nitre," "spirits of turpentine," and other spirits without crossing, prayer, and purification.

The Discovery of Oxygen by Dr. Priestly, of England, in 1774, was affected by submitting the peroxyd of mercury to the affinity suspending effect of the rays of sunlight concentrated by a powerful lens; or burning glass, just as battery action or heat does now, and would have done then, had the rationale of the premises been understood.

The Effects of the Discovery of Oxygen are said to have in a measure revolutionized the manners, customs, and scientific assume of the world; more so, in fact, than the discovery of attraction of gravitation during the previous century. It gave origin nearly all the leading trades, separated metals from their ores, and effected thousands of other compositions, decompositions, and recompositions of the most wondrously progressive arts, sciences, and manufactures of that day and generation.

The Methods of Procuring Oxygen are various. It can be obtained from nearly all the elements, under the powerful affinity suspending supervision of battery action. The more ready and inexpensive means, however, is the exposure of the black oxyd of manganese or chlorate of potass to the red heat of a retort, or the electrical decomposition of water.

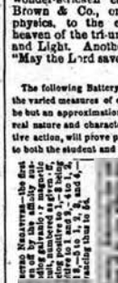
Oxygen Physically Considered, is a transparent, tasteless, colorless, odorless gas, one-tenth heavier than air and one-fifth of its volume; very slightly refractive and magnetic, but never as yet condensed to a liquid. It is soluble, and will diffuse 4.5 of its volume in 100 volumes of water.

Oxygen Chemically Considered, is neutral, seemingly passive, and void of alkaline qualities, yet when polarly aroused becomes an element of the most extraordinary power, manifesting and exerting affinities proportionally strong or weak as is the polar distance of its elementary chosing. Save fluorine, its next polar, or electric-negative neighbor, oxygen has an affinity for all the elements, increasing as their polar distances increase, in their respective pathways of polar departure from it.

A recurrence to the Battery Record, republished in this issue will show the wondrously wide and active range of its affinities. It forms gases with some elements; with others it forms fluids, liquids, and solids. With some it forms neutral compounds, with others, corrosive acids, and with others burning alkalies. With some the most nourishing food, and with others the most virulent poisons.

Oxygen as a Supporter of Combustion is the chief and almost only one; all substances that burn in the open air must combine with oxygen in the process of burning, and will burn with much greater intensity in oxygen gas than in the open air. Combustion or burning is but a more rapid process of oxydation, as the ordinary process of rusting. Many of the unaccountable fires of every day life are produced by the oxydization of articles, as that of phosphorous when taken out of water and exposed to the oxygen of the atmosphere (though more slowly); or as the slaking of quicklime by water.

Oxygen as a Supporter of Respiration is of the utmost importance and indispensable as a vitalizer of the blood, as well as a sanitary regulator of our surroundings.



Oxygen as a Component Part of the Air is in a mechanical state of combination with nitrogen as twenty-three to seventy-seven, 7,000,000,000 pounds of which are daily consumed by respiration, oxydization, and otherwise. It constitutes over one-fifth of the forty-five mile atmosphere encircling the globe.

Oxygen as a Component Part of Water is found combined with hydrogen, constituting eight-ninths of the water's weight, and containing in this condensed state eight hundred of its volumes in one volume of water—or 800 times less space in water than the atmosphere. The ocean covers two-thirds of the earth, and averages nearly two miles in depth, and contains enough oxygen to form an atmosphere around the globe nearly one thousand miles deep.

Oxygen in the Mineral Kingdom constitutes one-half of the alumina, lime, and silicia encrusting the globe. It constitutes four-fifths of the weight of the vegetable kingdom, and three-fourths of the weight of the animal kingdom. Human investigation has not as yet discovered that establishes beyond question the fact that oxygen constitutes one-half of the world as an electro-negative, which, however unpopular, is evidently true, and in support of which there is one live chemist, whom I most cheerfully quote. Prof. Youmans says very truthfully: "The part played by oxygen in the scheme of nature is imposing in the highest degree. In virtue of its boundless abundance, its diffusive nature, the vast range and strength of its attractions, and the unchangeableness of its combinations, it would seem to have been appointed to the grand office of taking charge of all other elements and bringing them into an orderly, permanent system. The rocks and waters of the earth consist of materials given over to its custody. Saturated with it, they are in a condition of the most perfect chemical stability. Enveloping our planet in its free condition, it manifests an irresistible passion to seize upon and possess all things. The deadly foe of life, it would destroy all organized beings, and pursuing them to the very tomb, decompose and dissolve their structures, carrying back their elements to the quiescent world. This element has therefore been personified as the genius of the air—an omnipresent, destructive spirit, which holds the globe in its consuming embrace and revels in conflagration, and would reduce all things to ashes and rust. But the earth has not been left to the operation of its own forces. Celestial radiations are the antagonists of oxygen, and their agency [illegible] the world from its desolating influence, which will be shown in a due consideration of the chemistry and physiology of the premises."

Chemistry, like geology, astronomy, and all else in nature, carry their own record unstamped upon them by the laws of their being that no assumption of special inspiration can rub out. And now that we are under way and more at ease, it may not be amiss to remark in the conclusion of this article, there is no wonder that oxygen (the invisible) has been called up by the chemical magic of the past, nor need orthodoxy "marching after God" be surprised to, when up one of these spookish mornings and find Major General Oxygen or Hell in harness, is passing wonder-stricken empiricism, with old John Brown & Co., on the Appian Highway of physics, to the ever-beautiful and inviting heaven of the tri-une holies—Electricity, Heat, and Light. Another shriek of holy horror—"May the Lord save us!"

The following Battery Record of elements, indicative of the varied measures of electrical force, though claiming to be but an approximation of facts, tending to establish the real nature and character of a fundamental rule of affinitive action, will prove practically suggestive and important to both the student and chemical philosopher.

		Fluoride of Sodium.
		Chloride of Lithium.
		Bromide of Calcium.
		Iodide of Magnesium.
		Sulphide of Glucinum.
7 Bellenium.	50 Strontium.	Selenesis of Strontium.
8 Tellurium.	49 Barium.	Telluriate of Barium.
9 Nitrogen.	48 Titrium.	Nitrate of Yttrium.
10 Phosphorus.	47 Thorium.	Phosphate of Thorium.
11 Arsenic.	46 Osmium.	Arseniate of Osmium.
12 Antimony.	45 Palladium.	Antimoniate of Palladium.
13 Silicon.	44 Cerium.	Silicate of Cerium.
14 Boron.	43 Zirconium.	Borate of Zirconium.
15 Columbium.	42 Lanthanum.	[From this point the salts become less intense in their affinities, and finally merge into the mere oxyds, Fluorides, Chlorides, Bromides, Iodides, Sulphates, Seleneates, Telluriates, Nitrates, and other combinations, with the metals and alkaline earths.]
16 Tungsten.	41 Aluminum.
17 Molybdenum.	40 Zinc.
18 Manganese.	39 Hydrogen.
19 Titanium.	38 Carbon.
20 Platinum.	37 Cadmium.
21 Uranium.	36 Rubidium.
22 Rhodium.	35 Mercury.
23 Iridium.	34 Chromium.
24 Vanadium.	33 Iron.
25 Gold.	32 Nickel.
26 Silver.	31 Cobalt.
27 Copper.	30 Bismuth.
28 Lead.	29 Tin.

The elements numbered 7, 8, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 50, 51, 54, are comparatively scarce and unimportant. The new elements, Didymium, Erbium, Niobium, Norium, Ruthenium, Tantalum, Thallium, Thorium, and Iodium, have been discovered since my analysis was made.

MEDIUMSHIP OF MISS M. K. CASSEIN.

Letter from G. C. Stewart.

BROTHER JONES:—A day or two since I noticed a letter from Brother Drury, reflecting rather severely on the honesty of one of our Newark mediums, Miss M. K. Cassein. I called the attention of Miss C. to the article, and she requested me to answer Bro. D., a request that I cheerfully comply with, as Miss C. is quite a favorite of the Spiritualists of Newark, and we consider any shaft aimed at our mediums as a declaration of war against the whole of us. Bro. Drury's letters are before me, and give evidence of literary attainments that should have prevented him from thus assaulting the character of a young lady, a stranger to him, without further evidence, all for two postage stamps. In his first letter to Miss C., he calls himself a brother; in his second he asks her to sit again for him, and chides her severely for sending him her ordinary business card, and his third is a regular black mail letter, a copy of which I enclose. Miss C. sat a second time for him, but could not get even a whimper from his spirit friends, and now he is after her through the public press to ruin her, if possible, all for six cents.

Does not Bro. D. perceive that his last letter puts her in a dilemma? She must either send two stamps and thereby tacitly admit the fraud, or else be posted in the public prints. He also proves himself a fraud willing to be bought off and keep mum for six cents. If he really is interested in our cause, and is governed by no mean motives, we can not imagine how he could do less than to have written to Newark if too poor to come over to us. By this course he could soon learn that Miss Cassein is above suspicion, that she is real grit, and that her motto is "Millions for defence, not one cent for black mailing."

Her terms were plain and distinct, viz. "M. K. Cassein answers sealed letters without charge during the month of August. Enclose envelope and three stamps, 185 Bank st., Newark, N. J." Her terms are plain and distinct, no guarantee, no promise to make up an answer—the people seemed to appreciate the offer. Nine hundred letters came, all but sixty were answered. One person wrote two, and enclosing a dollar in each, requested the medium to retain the money even if she got no answer, and only one somehead puts in an appearance. Bro. Drury wrote twice to the spirits, had two stamps, had two letters answered (yet denies it) and now wants two stamps under threat. Miss Cassein's rule in sitting for pay, is to return the money if she gets no answer, but August was an exceptional month. She said plainly to the people, "Enclose three stamps to cover expenses, and I will sit for nothing," and we do not believe that more than one of the nine hundred would accept their stamps if tendered to them, and Bro. D. stands forth as a high minded minister.

We do not believe that Bro. Drury is actuated by a sincere desire to detect fraud, and thus purify the Spiritualistic Church, from the fact that he could be bought off for so small a sum, and we call upon him to give the subject a thorough investigation, and when convinced that he has blundered, make amends honorable. A gentleman who is not identified with us stated to a party that he wrote a sealed letter to his spirit wife, requesting her to answer it, sign his name in full, and direct it to his name, street, and number. He carefully omitted all proper names, and everything by which the medium could get a clue to his name or whereabouts. He sent it to Miss Cassein, and in a few days received an answer from his wife with her name in full, directed to his name, street, and number. He is a reliable man, and knows Miss Cassein, but am not sure that he would like this kind of notoriety. The above is but one of many. Miss C.'s prospects for the future are promising. She is young and frail, and sitting under spirit influence, was formerly quite exhausting, but she is now enabled to do a great amount of writing without any serious injury. The following is Brother Drury's letter, copied and underscored verbatim.

Newark, N. J.

Miss M. K. Cassein:—You did not answer my letter. When I wrote you the first time I enclosed three stamps for your advertisement, you used but one of them in writing to me. The second time I wrote I enclosed a stamped envelope, which left the two stamps still in your possession. Now I wish you to return them (you having failed to do as you advertise), at once or I will publish you as a fraud and humbug. I mean what I say."

DAVID M. DRURY.

Williamsburgh, L. I.

REMARKS:—We have given place to the foregoing reply in behalf of Miss Cassein. She is now well advertised, and notwithstanding we have two or three other letters on file making similar complaint to that of Mr. Drury, nothing will be gained by publishing them.

THE Science of Evil;
OR
FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION.
BY JOEL MOODY.
THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION, and clearly shows that without Evil there can be neither Morals, Science, Knowledge, or Human Action on earth. In fact, without Evil, man could not exist. This work fully solves the PROBLEM, and unveils the MYSTERY of Evil, giving it a scientific meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES you SOCIAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD.
The book is 6 large 12 mo., of 348 [illegible] printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy [illegible] $1.75; postage, 20 cents.

MEDIUM'S DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so forget their self respect as to speak well of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are far their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register as soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulgence in such unkindness.

It should be borne in mind that sentiments visiting mediums carry conditions with them—so to speak—which aid or destroy the power of spirits to control the medium visited: hence it is that one medium gives satisfaction to certain persons, another better to others—all having their friends, and justly so, too, and all equally honest and useful in their places.

Health by Good Living.
BY W. W. HALL, M. D.,
Editor of Hall's "Journal of Health."

THIS book is to show how high health can be maintained by common diseases cured by "good living," which consisting with a relish the best food, prepared in the best manner.

The best food includes meats, fish, poultry, wild game fruits, and the grains which make bread.

The best cookery preserves the natural tastes and juices.

As there can be no "good living" without a good appetite, how to get this great blessing without money and without price, is pointed out, and, it is hoped, in very clear and plain terms.

Some of the subjects treated are:—

The object of eating: Power to work: Early breakfast: Dinner-time: Luncheon: Eating "down town:" What shall a man do? What shall fat men eat? How to get fat: Bad blood: Diet for the sick: Spring diseases: Children's eating: Forcing children to eat: Young ladies' eating: Cold feet and headache: Biliousness: A lazy liver: Mischievous tonics: The out-door air: Why are we dyspeptic? Discomfort after eating: Cole slaw: Certain cure of neuralgia: Nervous debility: Air and exercise: Food cure, etc., etc.

It tells about

Luncheons and how to take them: Late dinners and how to take them: How drunkards are made at eating-houses: How girls are spoiled at boarding-schools: How health is lost: How home love is lost: How several reading rules them: How love of dress is instilled: How young men are talked about: How bad matches are made: How good wives are made at home: How to have Infantile purity.

The Bible in India.
HINDOO ORIGIN OF
Hebrew and Christian Revelation.
TRANSLATED FROM
"LA BIBLE DANS L' INDE."
BY LOUIS JACOLLIOT.

EXTRACTS FROM AUTHOR'S PREFACE:

"I come to show you humanity, after attaining the loftiest regions of speculative philosophy, of untrammeled reason on the venerable soil of India, wastrammeled and stifled by the altar that substituted for intellectual life a soul-brute existence of dreaming impotence.

India is the world's cradle; hence it is that the common mother in sending forth her children even to the utmost west, has in unfading testimony of our origin, bequeathed us the legacy of her language, her laws, her morals, her literature, and her religion.

To religious despotism, imposing, speculative delusions, and class-legislation, may be attributed the decay of nations.

.....Aware of the resentment I am provoking, I prepare to shrink not from the encounter.....We are no longer burnt at the stake."

$3.00 per year, $1.50—6 months, $1.—4 mo.
☞ Fifty cents for Three Months on Trial
TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Order, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names entered on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the time of their subscriptions, and to forward what is [illegible] year, with or without further reminder whether he has payment.

1. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount, whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

2. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which the subscription has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 10th, 1870, it will be marked, "Smith J.—10 Dec.—70," which will mean December 10th, 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 10th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—10 Dec.—69, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

The Passive Power of the Universe; of Food, the Air we Breathe, etc.—The Pool of Water; its Passive Power, as Exercised in Creating and Destroying—The Circulation of the Blood a Result of Passive Power.

NUMBER LVII.

A GOD,—where is he? We have traveled in ancient localities, perused the musty records of primeval times, held converse with ancient sages, journeyed from sphere to sphere, planet to planet, in search of him, yet have failed to find a God such as the Christian world to-day are worshiping! In all this protracted Search, while listening to the music that emanates from angels' lips on the evergreen shores of the Summer Land, we have never caught one sound, one note, or one word that ever proceeded from Deity. The sun shone upon us, the breezes fanned us, the water quenched our thirst, the food satisfied our hunger, music thrilled our soul with joy unspeakable, social converse and pleasures made us happy—from them alone we have derived especial benefit, and yet we have never thought of worshiping any one. If you should reverentially kneel down and ask God to quench your thirst when suffering therefrom, and if you found immediate relief, you would attribute it to him; but would not a goblet of water do as much, be as useful and beneficial?—though you would not pay homage to that. If suffering from starvation, and if sustained and preserved from death by the direct power of God, would he be doing more than good nourishing food could?

You find by experience that water quenches the thirst,—it acts in a mysterious manner in the transmission of its qualities, and if the same feat could be accomplished without your drinking it, you would regard the operation as produced through the direct agency of a God. The material world sustains each sphere of the Spirit World in the same specific manner as the body sustains all the interior bodies of the soul. The outer or coarser body is essential for the development and growth of all the interior bodies with which the soul is clothed. Then, in our Search for God, it might be well to inquire, in what relation does matter stand to spirit, if it acts such an important part in creation? Is it true that man has sundry interior bodies now, which he will use as occasion demands in the various spheres of the Spirit World? When death comes, the body we now use is laid quietly aside,—is finely dressed, and placed in an ornamented coffin,—while the soul, with its second outer body, rises grandly to the Spirit World to revel in its glories and enjoy its varied scenery. The body that it now has, after the first death occurs, was contemporaneous with the earthly body, and before it can ascend to the next high. er sphere, it must pass through a peculiar change, peculiar only to itself. These various changes that occur in the life of each individualized entity, are caused as naturally as a goblet of water will quench the thirst. You are not instrumental in causing the water to quench your thirst or food to satisfy your hunger, only as you drink the water and eat the food. They act a specific part in the economy of creation,—they possess power,—it is passive power,—it is the power (seemingly) of a God. Now, listen. Do n't become bewildered or frightened or call us a Pantheist. What! is water God,—food God,—the air God? You drink water, and the thirst ceases; you eat food, and the hunger and languor is banished; you breathe the pure air, and life is sustained and prolonged. What of these? Is there power there? Yes, passive power, to accomplish a specific purpose. Passive power is the power of a God, is it? Will you look a goblet of water; in a short time it may be again in the heavens, or reposing as dew-drops in some sweet flower; it may be temporarily changed to gases, but these again unite, and the water is as pure—as wholesome—as when tinged with a cherry red, it traversed the gilded avenues of the body. It is in the system to-day, but out of it to-morrow. The same quantity that quenched your thirst is now riding on the bosom of a storm-cloud, or falling drop by drop on your roof, or slaking the thirst of the deer on our prairies. There is a passive power in the water that quenches the thirst; a passive power in food that satisfies the hunger. This passive power cannot be seen, cannot be heard. The icicle pendant on yonder roof has had a glorious mission. Years ago, in traditionary times, we might say, it circulated in royal veins, and beat the pulse of a king, giving brilliancy to his eyes and animation to his body. Its work has been grand and glorious. It has given away nothing. It has cooled the fevered brow, moistened the parched tongue, satisfied the thirst of the weary traveler, yet to-day on yonder roof it still exists. The water passes over the tongue, and its passive power quenches the thirst. That passive power exists in all things; it is the "Soul of Things." The water in the goblet only possesses passive power. The tree falls to the ground in consequence of a passive power which it cannot resist.

What causes the wind?—a passive vacuum. The progress of the wind is passive,—that is to say, there is no force behind it—none before it. The material world only acts passively, in accordance with this Universal Soul, which is within itself perfect passivity.

* * * * * Oh, how grand the passive power of the universe! It is seen in all the manifestations of the material world. Look at that pool of water—it sparkles in the sunbeams—scintillates with all the colors of the rainbow, and passively submits to the forces acting upon it! How quiet, how patient as it lies there so calmly on the bosom of mother earth! By and by the sun comes forth from the gates of the azure east, and acting passively upon it with its electric rays, absorbes every drop in that pool, and soon they are lost to the scrutinizing gaze of man. Oh, wondrous transformation!—invisible to our senses, it has been transformed to mist, and now repcses in the genial bosom of the air, a passive power lulling it to rest. But by and by another passive power acts upon the mist,—different currents of air meet it, and it is conducted to the bosom of a storm-cloud, and now how swiftly it moves on the wings of the wind! Like a procession of furious demons, like an immense serpent, it passes along, an avenging spirit, a willing subject to the passive power of the elements! In the distance is another cloud, and the electric flash passes between them—another passive instrument in the material world. What a light!—how vivid! like a chain of devils incarnate; and then the howl that follows sounds as if all the demons of Pandemonium had been let loose. The sight is appalling! How terrifying to the beholder! It seems as if the artillery of heaven had been called out, and the various agents of the universe marshalled in one deadly conflict. Such vivid flashes of electric light, followed by thunder, shaking the very earth,—what a sense of superstition it excites, and we are inclined to ascribe it all to an omniscient, omnipotent, omnipresent God! Hark! the lightnings are caged, the thunders hushed, and there is a calm. A gentle shower follows—the pattering rain-drops fall and the buds swell and blossom, the earth looks green and all nature smiles. That pool of water had left its quiet resting-place, danced heavenward on rays of genial light, rode on the bosom of a storm-cloud, caressed the electric flash, and now it was presented to the famished buds and flowers of earth. A passive power had accomplished this. But the mission of this pool of water was not ended. It had bathed the languishing plants of earth, kissed the opening bud into a full, rich blossom, caused the seed to send forth its germ to see what was going on around, cooled the fevered brow, and quenched the thirst of the withered fields, and yet lost none of its particles. The pool of water was all left yet. Some of it was a dew-drop on that parched blade of grass; some of it was dreaming of the beauties and grandeur of creation in the bosom of that sweet flower; some of it was circulating in the veins of a weary traveler; some of it, in tears of sorrow, was coursing its way down the cheek of a sorrowing woman; some of it was purifying a foul ulcer that licentiousness had made; some of it was subduing a raging fever; some of it rested on a fevered brow—in all these conditions it was exerting a passive influence—ah! how grand its mission! How beneficent in its results! How potent its action! How useful in all departments of life! Did God, such as humanity worship, accomplish as much, he would be useful to the world, and worthy of all praise! Pool of sparkling water! shall we worship thee? More valuable than diamonds or gold, or all the precious metals, you fly in the heavens, ride on the bosom of a storm cloud, flash along the rays of the sun, give tints to the rainbow, and while listening to the artillery of heaven, plan a field for future usefulness on earth! But the mission of this pool of water is not ended. Again it ascends heavenward. There is a charm in the surging elements—in the flashing lightning, roaring thunder, the moaning of the wind, and off it goes, and as mist, different currents of air act upon it, and it is changed into a prodigious hailstone, and is transported to a dark, portentious cloud—it is then hurled along with terrific speed—rides like a warrior in search of an enemy! The sun shines upon its crystal sides, and they glisten with all the colors of the rainbow, and it seems to smile with gladness. On it goes—but its mission of mercy is changed to one of destruction! A guardian angel before, aiding humanity in a thousand different ways, it is now changed to a demon of destruction, and as it passes along, it observes a flaxen-haired girl, and moving with terrific force, falls upon her head and she is killed thereby! Fiend incarnate! Why so cruel, so unmerciful? A Florence Nightingale in your actions before, now a Hayman,—an assassin. The same passive power that transformed the pool of water to the bosom of the storm cloud, transformed it into a hailstone, and then hurled it against the happy, innocent girl. This is a passive power! Could God see, hear, think, feel, he would not have turned that pool of water from its' errands of mercy among the flowers, the herbs, the thirsty, the sick, and made it a demon of destruction to cause the death of an unoffending little girl! As you advance toward the Arcana of Nature, and open its gilded doors, you observe nothing but passive forces, and they will ever be beyond the comprehension of man. Look at that hailstone that has just passively completed its errand of destruction—it soon melts, and again is tossed to and fro in the heavens above, and is now formed into raindrops, and falls in the goblet of the weary traveler. Ah! he quenches his thirst with it, and soon that water which had operated as effectually as the hangman's halter, is coursing the gilded avenues of his body, and has become as red as a cherry! It is now in the heart, and with one pulsation, it leaves it, passes over the air cells of the lungs, holds sweet converse with them for a moment, changes from a blue to a cherry color, and with joy unspeakable, returns to the heart to be distributed to the systemic circulation. What power causes this? Yes, what caused that pool of water to evaporate, to go to the heavens above, to hug to its bosom the electric flash, and then as hailstone act the part of an assassin? It was the passive power of the elements. You may explain how this is done, but never, NEVER, NEVER can man so penetrate the soul of things so as to explain why it is done. The blood circulates in the veins, for there is a passive power there that causes it, and that belongs to the Universal Soul.

Puny child you are, to think to so little purpose, to gaze at the universe and never discover the passive power that seems to impregnate every molecule of matter. But as you glance at the blood circulating in the veins, traversing the various avenues of the body, did you ever think of the pulsating life there? Animals in the blood, in the tear that falls down the cheek, in the muscles, in the intestines—all through the system! What is active power and what is passive power? The action of all the material elements is passive. No active power is exerted in the formation of a raindrop, a hailstone, a tornado, or in the circulation of the blood. There is nothing behind the hurricane, or before it. Is a vacuum power? Ha! Ha! Why, the nearer you approach a perfect vacuum, the nearer you approach nothing. Yet the air rarified, rising, creating a void, approaching to nothing, causes a terrific tornado. Yet this is a passive power, a peculiarity of matter, which the wisest sage can never explain! To say that the rarification of the atmosphere in one place causes the wind, a movement in the air, is not explaining the cause of the phenomenon at all—it is merely giving a fact, without its cause.

We gaze around us, at the world of activity we see the opening bud, the expanding leaf, the rainbow-tinted flower, the tender shrub, and while we behold the secret workings of passive power, we feel like saying we have found the pulse of God, felt its pulsations, and as we were about to kneel down in adoration before it, the pool of water comes before us, and says "Hark! examine my weird career!" and again dancing heavenward, it forms a dark, portentous cloud, and passively charging itself with electricity, it proceeds earthward again, and hovering like a a fiend over the poor man's cottage, gazing like a devil on the little ones sleeping there, it sends forth the flash of electric light—the father and mother and little ones are killed, and the house consumed by fire! We turn from this passive power with a cold shudder in our heart, our knees refuse to bend in adoration before it, and in sadness we wipe the tear from our eyes, and wonder, if all is perfection, all is right, all is just, in its action!

The Analyst for September.

Our good Brother Toohey, who edits the Spiritual Analyst, has been seriously offended at a note that appeared in the JOURNAL some time ago, referring to the criticism of E. S. Wheeler, on the writings of Andrew Jackson Davis, and asserts vehemently that we make a pope out of Davis, and a "Shoo-Fly" out of Wheeler and Company.

The article in question was written in an innocent vein of humor, with not the least intention of wounding the feelings of the indefatigable Toohey, or the irrefragible Wheeler. The Analyst says that our note simply means, "Mr. Davis has written books and you have not. Shoo fly! Don't you touch him or them until you do!—logically making Mr. Davis a spiritual pope, and Shoo-fly, Wheeler and Company bugs and ox-flies." We regret that we have offended our brother by using certain animals to express our meaning, but supposing that he had read Josh Billings' work on the history of the shoo fly, mosquito, and potato-bug, we used the terms in order to illustrate what we desired. Had we compared him to a "sardine fly" or "bottle fly," he would have been justified in allowing his English blood to rise, but under the circumstances he should remember what the Bible says: "Grievous words stir up anger."

Mr. Toohey says: "Western extravagance is proverbial," and thereupon follows the rumble, jumble, monotonous tumble of angry words, as if the very life of the Analyst depended on attacking our humorous note in the most bolsterous way possible. "Western extravagance" is one thing and English bluster another. Brother Toohey has an abundance of the latter, and it was all excited to action by our innocent allusion to Shoo Fly, Mosquito & Co., and he frisks around in a terrible manner. But we understand the motives of Brother Toohey. He is sharp, decidedly so, and he wished to do some gratuitous advertising in the JOURNAL, knowing that it had an extensive circulation. He has lived long enough in America to have his Johnny Bull begin to resemble an American Calf, which is the beginning of wisdom on the part of a foreigner. Therefore, knowing what our good brother meant, we desire to say that we have received the Spiritual Analyst for September. Brother John Westherbee has therein an able article on "Nerve Atmosphere." "The Illumination, or the Sleep-Walker" contains many interesting facts. "Pre-Historic Times," "Rain Under the Roof," and "Spiritual Health" are good. The editorial items are interesting. The criticism on "Shoo Fly," as it appeared in the JOURNAL, is decidedly ungrionious—simply English boisterousness.

We would recommend the Analyst as occupying a position in literature midway between the light reading of the New York Ledger, and the more substantial matter of the Golden Age,—while its editor neither resembles Horace Greeley or Susan B. Anthony,—could not write an address on agriculture or make a sensational speech on woman's rights.

He is doing a splendid work as editor of the Analyst, and we have had occasion to make many extracts therefrom, and if he ever sees fit to become angry at our "Shoo Fly," and allows his English blood to boil we will let the animal out of the cage in which we now have him confined, and he will buzz around the ear of Brother Toohey, in a manner that will extract all the English blood out of him, while some of our Chicago mosquitoes will supply the place thereof with some taken from the people of Chicago, making a full fledged American out of him. Or, we will "turn him over" to the Poughkeepsie Seer, who will be sure to let him quietly rest on his laurels.

A steel engraving representing the expression of Brother Davis, while reading the criticisms on his works, and his determination to let all the writers thereof severely alone, would find more purchasers than "The Last Supper"—representing Christ and his apostles. Such an engraving of him would be truly expressive. We hope to see one sometime.

Now, Brother Toohey, keep quiet, or pay the penalty to our "Shoo Fly." Will the papers of America, England, Hindoostan, Zanguibar, Hollow Globe, Morocco, New Zealand, and those printed in that country tributary to the Nile, please copy.

☞ All subscriptions for the Spiritual Analyst, should be sent to W. F. Brown & Co., Publishers, 50 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

A Crime Foretold by Clairvoyance.

On Monday evening, September 4th, as Dr. Kayner, of St. Charles, Ill., was seated in conversation with Mr. and Mrs. Orlando Van Horn, in their house in Franklin, De Kalb county, he became suddenly entranced, and stated to them that he "saw a dark bay or brown horse with a sheepskin on, ridden hurriedly into a lane by a man about five feet nine or ten inches high, wearing a broad brimmed hat, dark coat, and pants a little lighter. The man hurriedly dismounts and hitches his horse near some trees on the opposite side of the lane from the house, and some terrible crime is about to be committed that will startle this whole community to its foundations. The people in this section are all excited, and are running in all directions. The greatest crime that has ever been perpetrated in this part of the country will be committed in this immediate vicinity in less than one week. Mark it, it is soon to occur, and these events will take place in less than seven days, and you will hear of it."

Mr. and Mrs. Van Horn told this prophecy to several of their neighbors during the week, remarking that they should watch close, to see if there was anything in it.

On Monday morning, September, 11th, like a clap of thunder in a clear sky, or like an earthquake upon a sleeping city, sweeping over the country like a tornado, spread the news that the demon of murder had been abroad, and in his rage for human gore, had assassinated in the most fiendish manner, old Carl Wiesenberg and his wife, of Franklin.

Their brother-in-law, Mr. Donnenfelt, was accused by Fred. Myers, of an attempt to take his life early in the morning, and a warrant for his arrest procured, and the attempt to serve it revealed the fact of the murder. Further search being made, Donnenfelt was found hanging in the shed, and dead also.

From the statement of Myers, the coroner's jury rendered a verdict that the old people were murdered by Donnenfelt, who afterward hung himself.

But Donnenfelt was cold and stiff when found—the others were not two hours after. Donnenfelt was nowhere discolored except where the rope pressed his neck. Had strychnine been given before, and he hung after death, such might be the case. This the community are considering to-day, and are being "stirred to their very depths" over the idea that the murderer is till alive and free.

These events occurred some three miles distant from Mr. Van Horn's, as the bird flies, and several witnesses, among whom are Mr. Orlando Van Horn and wife and Jim. McGallagher, are ready to testify that Dr. Kayner actually foretold the matter at the time specified exactly in the words stated herein.

Do "coming events cast their shadows before," and can the mind's eye, through clairvoyance, see the pictures those shadows make, and read their hidden meaning? We leave it for our readers to judge.

Letters of Fellowship.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY granted Letters of Fellowship to Brothers J. F. Hollister of Plano, Ill., and J. A. Snodgrass, of Redding, Iowa, on the 27th of September ult., constituting them "Regular Minister of the Gospel," authorizing them to "solemnize marriages," in due form of law. May their services be in frequent requisition, and may good angels inspire them as lecturers, with power to utter words of consolation to mourners, and great truths for the enlightenment of the people.

Fraternal Calls.

Bro. Orr, of New Jersey, editor of the American Odd Fellow, and Past Grand Marshal of the Grand Lodge of I. O. O. F. of the U. S. and some thirty other Grand Representatives from as many States and the Dominion, gave us fraternal calls during the session of the Grand Lodge in this city last week—all happy believers in the philosophy of spirit communion.

The late session and public procession of the Grand Lodge of the I. O. O. F. was an imposing affair in this city. It carried us back on the page of memory some twenty years, to the time when we were Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, and Grand Representative from the same State, to the Grand Lodge of the United States, then holding its regular sessions at Baltimore.

Our love for the order has not abated a whit. It is an organization whose motto is "Friendship, Love, and Truth." One of its cardinal virtues is to visit the sick, bury the dead, and educate the orphans.

It abhors creeds and avowed systems of faith which create heart-burnings and divisions among men. It leads man step by step, to a proper appreciation of its fitness as a minister to the trials and adversities inseparable from human life. Odd Fellowship was a forerunner of Spiritualism, and like it has been anathematized by bigoted churches—thousands having been expelled from church fellowship for being members of the fraternity.

Odd Fellowship is based upon the principles of universal brotherhood, and as a social and benevolent institution, is far in advance of any church organization that has ever been instituted among men.

In a word, it is the aim of Odd Fellowship to lead man to a proper cultivation of that true fraternal relation toward his fellow man, designed by the Great Author of his being.

MRS. A. E. MOSSOP.

This estimable lady is at present lecturing to the Spiritualist Society in Chicago. Five years ago he was an ardent Catholic, and being gifted with a voice of remarkable sweetness and purity, she was engaged to sing for that denomination in the St. Joseph Church, Dayton, Ohio, receiving for her services a very liberal compensation. Finally she went to reside at the genial and hospitable home of Dr. J. J. Macilheney, and while there, tried the influence of a developing circle, in company with several of the prominent ladies and gentlemen of the town. Unexpectedly to her and the friends of the circle, she was soon entranced, and spirits spoke to those present, encouraging words from the Summer Land.

From that time her development was rapid, and she was soon enabled to take the rostrum and give utterance to those grand ideas and principles which her guides wished to impart to humanity.

As an evidence of the remarkable prophetic powers of E. V. Wilson,—five years ago he predicted that she would some day occupy the rostrum as a spiritual lecturer, and would battle nobly for the cause of Harmonial Philosophy. This prediction has been fully realized.

She lectured for the Spiritualists of Sturgis, Michigan, two months, acquitting herself in a manner entirely satisfactory to the society.

She lectures in this city the next three Sabbaths, and would be glad to make engagements for the winter months. Address her in care of J. G. Waite, Sturgis, Mich.

CURES BY SPIRIT POWER.

Testimonials.

The following are specimens of millions of similar cases of suffering from like complaints. That all such cases can be speedily cured under spiritual directions,—even by letter, without the medium ever seeing the sick person,—is established beyond successful controversy.

Mrs. A. H. Robinson (whose card will be found in this paper) diagnoses and prescribes for every conceivable phase of disease, acute and chronic, by letter, besides treating those who call at her residence, 148 4th avenue, Chicago.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON—Dear Madam:—It is with the utmost reluctance that I consult a lady about my complaint; but I have doctored enough to convince me that there is no help for me unless it be through the spirit. My disease is the piles. I have had them twenty years, and tried many remedies without experiencing the least benefit. I was forty-four years old the first of last October, and have plenty of faith that you can help me. Inclosed you will please find $3.00 and a lock of my hair.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain,
Respectfully yours,
MOSES S. HARTLEY.

Henry, Ill., Jan. 10th, 1871.

Mrs. Robinson, under spirit control, diagnosed and prescribed for the case, and the patient reported from time to time, receiving appropriate remedies to effect a permanent cure. On the 11th day of April he says: "I have kept up the treatment faithfully, and now I am happy to inform you I feel certain I am getting well. I wish I could impress upon you how thankful I am." Again, writing from Saratoga, where he is at work, he says: "I am more than glad to inform you that I am well."

ANOTHER CASE.

R. B. Markle, of Baker City, Oregon, writing and sending a lock of hair and usual fee, says:

"I have tried our doctors to no effect. I am a man nearly fifty-three years of age, and have long been troubled with a weak back and pain in the small of my back; this pain lately moved to my hip-joint, and also down my left leg to my foot. I am in other respects healthy and of temperate habits.

"R. B. MARKLE."

Baker City, Oregon, Aug. 6th, 1871.

Mrs. Robinson in the usual manner diagnosed and prescribed, and on the 10th of September ult, Mr. Markle writes to her, "I am entirely cured,"—expressing much gratitude to the powers controlling her.

—Read the advertisement of that most wonderful work, JESUS OF NAZARETH.

—Use NATURE'S HAIR RESTORATIVE.

Personal and Local.

—Brother J. L. Potter, will you please give us your regular post office address, that those who wish to write you may know where to direct letters. Your reply to Jamieson is more suitable for the columns of the Crucible, in which he has a department. The professed liberality of the editors of that paper is the combative line, will doubtless guarantee you a hearing in reply to attacks upon you by one of its editors.

—Our friend, Dr. Dumont C. Dake, is having splendid success in his fall campaign against disease. See his advertisementin another column.

—This week we had the pleasure of a call from Captain John Grant, on his way from New Orleans to Wisconsin. We are always glad to see Brother Grant. He is well known to us as a hard-working liberal Spiritualist, and with plenty of the world's goods, he has what is still better, a large store laid up, waiting him when he passes over and joins his spirit friends.

—Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson will speak in Topeka the last two Sundays of October, and the Sundays of November. She will speak December, January, and February, in Southern Missouri; at Springfield, Carthage, Mansfield, and other places giving her a call.

—Brother L. P. Gilbert writes that "If some speakers going to Denver, will stop at Ellsworth, Kansas, for a few days, they will do well for the cause. People are ready for manifestations and tests."

—"The Sunday Question, and Self-Contradictions of the Bible," is meeting with a large demand. Get and circulate it among your friends.

—Brother C. B. Stewart, of Shullsburgh, Wisconsin, gives the following account of the wonderful cure performed by a healing medium, after the patient had been given up as incurable: "The people of this usually quiet village have recently been taken by surprise by the cure of a lady well known here, who had been given up by the regular physicians of this place, after a consultation. She was cured by a healing medium, Mrs. Ellen Brown, wife of one of our well known business men, Mr. Richard Brown. This cure has attracted a great deal of attention, and has set many to thinking who have heretofore scorned all such things, as a humbug. Mrs. Brown has been a medium for twenty years, and in that time has performed many surprising cures. One case of a girl who was paralyzed, and was doctored for two years, was cured by her in six weeks so that she was out jumping rope. She had to be carried to Mrs. Brown's residence. She has cured a case of nearly total blindness, so that the patient could read fine print by candle light. Also a very bad case of St. Vitus' Dance. Mrs. Brown cures by laying on of hands, and in every instance has succeeded, to the astonishment of all who were acquainted with the facts. The healing powers of Mrs. Brown have become a matter of considerable interest here, and are entirely unaccountable to either herself or the people."

—Will Sister Walsbrooker, when sending items here for publication, please give name of place where written, and date.

—E. Annie Hinman will speak in Paper Mill Village, N. H., Sept. 24th; in Lempster, Oct. 1st; in Keene, Oct. 8th. Will make engagements to lecture week evenings in the vicinity of Sunday appointments.

—We learn from the Banner of Light that A. J. and Mary E. Davis offer for sale their splendidly located house and lot in the beautiful town of Orange, N. J., at the low price of $7,500. The lot is 85 feet front and 110 deep, and as property is now selling there, is worth one hundred dollars per foot. It is within an hour's ride of New York City. A more desirable location can not be found in that vicinity.

—Dr. C. C. Brackett, of Lincoln, Ill., will answer calls to lecture. He has made a successful trip in Kansas.

—James Brooks, the developing medium, continues to hold developing circles with fair success. He also gives instructions to those who can not visit his rooms for personal interviews. We have seen many whom he has developed, that speak in high terms of his mediumistic powers as a developing medium. See his advertisement in another column.

—"The Biography of Satan," by K. Graves, is being severely criticised by numerous leaders of the orthodox flocks. Well, gentlemen, that just suits us. The little book has already passed through several editions, and with the help of the gratuitous advertising you give in thundering your maledictions upon it, we shall soon have the pleasure of issuing another large edition.

—Miss Susie M. Johnson, having had a partial rest from lecturing during the summer, is now ready to answer calls to lecture during the fall and winter months. Engagements in the West preferable. Her permanent address is 64 Grand River street, Detroit, Mich.

—K. Graves, having been re-appointed Missionary for the state of Indiana, by the Board of State Association, will postpone his contemplated tour westward for the present.

—Brother E. E. Perkins, of Kansas City, Mo., writes as follows: "To-day, while reading your editorial in the first number of volume eleven, I find myself involuntarily exclaiming, amen! May the RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL float its angelic folds over the whole world, from pole to pole, until mankind shall have learned the true principles of religion, life, liberty and happiness from the angel world. Yes, Brother Jones, you can count on me as a life subscriber to the JOURNAL, and also a life member, to assist in spreading its circulation,—never letting an opportunity pass where I can obtain a new subscriber, and the angels will pay me."

Thank you, brother—angels will bless you. We have many thousands of such friends, to say nothing of the hosts in the angel world who guide and inspire us in publishing our independent RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. All readers of this paper are respectfully requested to use their influence in like manner, in circulating the good news and glad tidings of angelic communion, to be found from week to week published in its columns.—ED. JOURNAL.

—Dr. J. K. Bailey gave us a call on Friday of last week, on his way westward.

—The Scientific Department has been transferred to third page.

—Dr. Child's articles on Spiritvolence will be concluded next week. No. 7 was received too late for insertion in this number.

—Mrs. Emma Hardinge will lecture at Westford, Mass., Sunday, Sept. 24th; in Boston Music Hall during October; in New York during November; and Salem during January, 1872. For other Sabbaths—in the Eastern States only—apply, care of Mr. Thomas Ramsey, 251 Washington street, Boston, Mass.

—Prof. Wm. Denton has a new volume of poems in press, entitled "Radical Rhymes," which will be issued in a few days.

Where do they go?

From the diary of a French physician we translate the following thrilling narrative for our readers:

In one of the most splendid mansions in the Rue de la Carriere lived for many years Mademoiselle Lizette, a famous courtezan, connected with one of the best families in the interior of France, who, early in life, impelled by an irresistible desire to see the world, came to this city and commenced keeping a boarding house for young girls.

She was a large woman, with bland manners, attractive, more by her power than her beauty, for she was plain.

She had a great influence over young girls, who felt in her presence a protection which is so much needed by this unhappy class who have left home and friends and cast themselves out on the dreary and desolate world. Many an innocent and ignorant child from the country has been attracted to her house and initiated by her in the road to infamy and crime. Her house was furnished in magnificent style. Every room was gorgeous, and all, from the attic to the ground floor were appropriated to these wretched inmates. Their dining room and kitchen, as is very customary with this class, were in the basement.

Lizette, dressed in the most extravagant style, wore the richest silks and laces that Paris afforded, had a profusion of valuable diamonds, and all that wealth could bring, and in her constant rounds of revelry and gaiety, many may have supposed she was fortunate and happy, but alas! this tinsel show and all these fine trappings fed not the soul. Lizette had early imbibed the habit, so common among her class, of using stimulants and opiates. She had used them for years when one day I was summoned to her bedside and she whispered to me that she had taken two ounces of laudanum in a mistake for whiskey. She was relieved by means of a stomach pump and emetics.

It was evident that these habits were wearing her out rapidly. She was no longer able to pay attention to her household. This was left to her attendants, and she was doubtless robbed by the men and women who were around her.

Still she kept up her style of living, and although she was at times obliged to pawn her diamonds, she was generally able to redeem them.

Four months since I was summoned to visit her, and found her lying upon the floor in a violent convulsion, frothing at the mouth, barking and snapping at those who were holding her. They feared she had hydrophobia, but I saw it was a case of hysterical convulsion, accompanying a severe attack of delirium tremens, which I learned she had been suffering with for several days. She had been unable to take any food or sleep during this time.

The house was in the wildest confusion, young girls running about in the most frantic manner, shrieking. "She is dying! she is dying! oh, Lizette, what shall we do?"

The only one in all that crowd who kept at all cool and could render me any assistance was a poor woman who had a family living in a small tenement near by. She was much better looking than Lizette, and although accustomed to working for her, they were quite intimate.

In a few moments I sent away the most excited of the girls and men, and got the others quieted down. She became calm, and as the storm around her subsided she rested.

We lifted her on a bed and she became partially conscious; had imperfectly lucid intervals, although most of the time she was raving, seeing frightful spectres in her room. The beautiful pictures on the walls were distorted into horrible images. The magnificent mirrors only reflecting scenes terribly disgusting, from which she recoiled with terror, screaming and hiding her face. The men and women whom I had compelled to be seated at some distance from her bedside that she might have the air, she saw as demijohns containing liquor, and I think the descriptions of what they contained were not only amusing, but probably very true, as they had all been drinking.

As her consciousness returned more clearly, she recognized me, and said:

"Oh doctor, I am so glad to see you! I have been arrested, and all the girls in my house, and we must all be hurried off to prison. Let me up; I must go at once."

Perceiving the condition of things, I replied in the most positive manner, and without any hesitation:

"I have just seen the Prefect of the Police, and he says if I will be surety for you, the matter can be settled, and you can go home."

Her eyes brightened. "Did you do it?"

"Yes," said I, "and if you will be still, matters can be arranged, and you will soon be better."

After this momentary gleam of sanity, a fearful vision of some horrible object caused her to scream. She begged for opium, or for liquor. She had taken no food for several days, and it was one of the worst cases of delirium tremens that I had ever seen. For two weeks she was thus raving, having brief lucid intervals, which were followed by more terrible delirium, in which the most horrible sights that imagination can conceive of, were presented to her.

Sometimes she saw beautiful and innocent young girls lured from the path of virtue, and falling into infamy and degradation.

Nothing could be more distressing than her condition. She had the Bible read to her, and her priest endeavored to console her, but it only aggravated her. Day after day the fearful struggle continued. All in the house become exhausted, almost insane. The girls were hysterical, and saw wild images that frightened them, so that many of them left. Men and women came who were companions in her infamy, but the lesson seemed to have little effect upon them. They blamed the physicians, several of whom we had called in to see her. At length, death came, to relieve us all, as we thought, at least to close the terrible scenes in that house for a time.

Among those who attended faithfully upon Lizette was a young man, Bernard Brant, son of the poor woman of whom we spoke as living in the rear of her mansion. She took quite a fancy to him, and when she could do so, all others away, she permitted him and his mother to remain and wait upon her.

In a moment death came, and the storm seemed suddenly quieted. All was calm, the girls returned to their homes, preparations were made for a grand funeral. Solemn high mass over her remains, and the hypocritical priest, who knew much more of her criminal life than he was willing to acknowledge, read long prayers and chanted to deems over her wretched form, which, from being quite beautiful, had come to be very disgusting, even though arrayed in costly robes and strewed with flowers. There was something dreadful in all this solemn mockery.

Two weeks after, I was summoned at midnight to see young Brant, who was reported to be dying. I found him lying on the floor struggling with violent convulsions, with four or five persons attempting to hold him. Every gesture and movement, and even the countenance reminded me of Lizette. I said to his mother:

"How much he acts like her?"

"Yes," said she, "I thought of that. Do you think he too, will die?"

"No," replied I, and assuming a very positive manner, I said, "You be here; it is her that is doing this," and he immediately personated her, speaking of her diamonds, her velvet cloak, and numerous other things which his mother declared he knew nothing about. He named several persons who had purchased things at the sale, and declared vengeance upon these; said she would have her diamonds, that they had been sold for much less than they were worth.

After speaking thus for a time the boy would be convulsed again. I attempted to reason with her, but in vain. The poor boy was thrown into horrible contortions. He declared that he was in a dark prison—could see nothing—could hear the walls, and would break them down. He (Lizette) told me this he kicked and dashed about in the most fearful manner. It required several persons to keep him from injuring himself.

Speaking to Lizette rather than to the boy, I asked her how she came here. She replied:

"I don't know. I have been in prison ever since you left me. I am not dead, as some have supposed, but am in prison, and these dark hart walls keep me here. I got out a few minutes this evening, and found this boy, and we had a good time getting some drinks."

The mother's story was that the boy had been at home all the evening and they were talking about Lizette, among many other things, about her clock. He got up hastily and ran out, saying, "Mother, I'll be back directly."

When he came in, he was intoxicated, and fell in convulsions. We learned that he had been to several places, and had drank liquor at each. I said to her, "Lizette, you have no right to injure the boy in this manner."

She replied, "I will not hurt him."

After considerable persuasion we succeeded in getting her to leave him, and he went quietly to bed.

Poor Lizette, what is to become of her? An outcast and wanderer, where can she go? Shut up, as she declares, in the walls, haunted by fearful visions of her past life, sometimes as hideous and grotesque as that they seem unendurable, and yet, there is no escape from them.

Well did the Master say, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone," but who shall deliver these poor, prison bound souls? If it was his mission to "preach to spirits in prison," so is it that of his followers and all good men and women, by their prayers and their loving sympathy, can help these poor ones. Again we ask, where do they go? The spirits tell not to heaven, for that is within man, and they do not have it. They go to purgatory, if you choose so to call it, to a place where mortals rather than spirits, may relieve them.

A Singular Exhibition.

At the "New British Gallery," in old Bond street, London, there is at present an exhibition of "spirit drawings in water colors." These drawings, one hundred and fifty five in number, consist entirely of curves and flourishes in all sorts of bright colors, interspersed with the finest and most elaborate threads of white tracery, as thin as the weavings of a spider's web. There appears to be no attempt, it is stated, to distinctly reproduce any object known to mortals, but occasionally some unknown fruit, suggestive of an immense ripe fig, is faintly shadowed on the paper. These "spirit-drawings" are described by a visitor to the exhibition as a little like seaweed, a little like feathers, and a little like anatomical preparations. They are, however, executed with great show of elaboration. The curves are drawn with exceeding care, the colors, extremely brilliant and harmoniously arranged, are delicately laid, on which over and through all is interwoven a net work of white lines of extraordinary fineness, resembling spun glass and gossamer.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Spiritualism encourages the happiest spiritual aspirations, energizes the soul by presenting only exalted motives, prompts to highest endeavors, and inculcates noble self reliance.—Hudson Tuttle.

JUST AFTER.

Pray leave me with my dead a little space;
In this dim room that lets the pale wild blue
Of winter coming in, the face,
Leave me, I plead of you.

Ah, well I know the words you wish to speak,
They are full sweet with counseling that cheers;
Yet sorrow, friend, has made these eyes so weak
They have but strength for tears.

Soon they shall be quite strong, I promise; soon
Lifted to see faith's beauteous sign gleam clear;—
Yes, o'er that gold beginning of a moon
Has ripened to its sphere.

Yet, oh, remembering what my love has been,
Remembering what death hides from me, and how
I shall have years to learn my patience in,—
Leave me with sorrow now!

Hymeneal.

On the 21th day of September, in the city of Chicago, Mr. John Hebert and Miss Cornelia Spilkins were united in marriage, Hon. S. S. Jones, President of the Religio-Philosophical Society, officiating.

Married, at Joliet, September 13th, by Rev. S. Knapp, John J. Kimball, of Dupage County, Ill., and Nellie M. Long, of Chicago.

Married, in Morristown, Rice County, Minnesota, September 18th, 1871, by Mrs. Harriet E. Pope, David A. Temple and Mrs. Amy Biker, all of the above place.

Obituary.

Passed to the home of the angels, August 24th, from N. P. Junction, Carleton County, Minnesota, Mrs. Mary M. Wort, wife of David L. Wort, aged 36 years. When she left, he sent over two hundred miles for a speaker to attend the funeral, rather than have one of different faith officiate. Herself and husband were both avowed Spiritualists, and it was only through our beautiful philosophy that he was sustained in his great bereavement. She leaves a son sixteen years of age, and a daughter of a few weeks, both of whom will share an angel mother's care.

Funeral services by the writer, August 30th.

HARRIET E. POPE.

Morristown, Rice Co., Minn.

August 9th, the Death Angel came unheralded for Bro. E. Pratt, of Winnebago City, Blue Earth County, Minnesota. He was thrown from a wagon, and so badly injured that he died in a few hours.

He was 71 years of age, yet he has twice walked over seventy miles to attend our Conventions. When we last parted with him in June, we asked him if he would be at the Convention, and he answered, "I will if I am in the form;" but after standing a minute, he added, "I shall be there anyway." And we shall surely expect him. He had long been a Spiritualist, and was anxious to go home to those who had gone before. Of him it may be truly said: "Being dead, he yet speaketh."

HARRIET E. POPE.

Morristown, Rice County, Minn.

Passed to spirit life, August 31st, Mary A. Allis, of Rome, wife of Milton Allis. She leaves a husband and five intelligent children. May their clairvoyant vision be opened, so that they will realize that she is not dead, but still liveth. Although she was not a believer in the Harmonial Philosophy, her spirit sight was opened, and she beheld her father and mother, long deceased, and conversed with them.

The funeral discourse was delivered at the Baptist Church, through Mrs. J. Fowler and Mrs. B. G. Horr, clairvoyant mediums.

Passed to spirit life, from Chicago, September 18th, Mrs. Malissa Barnes, aged 59 years. Mrs. Barnes was a native of Randolph, New York, and for the last fifteen years of her life was a thorough and consistent Spiritualist. She was attended in her last illness by her son, Dr. C. A. Barnes, of this city, who took her remains to La Porte, Ind., for burial.

An Entirely New Proposition.

We now have in press, and will be ready to fill orders before this notice reaches our readers a splendid new book, entitled THE SUNDAY QUESTION, and SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE.

This work consists of 123 large, closely printed pages. It is an exhaustive review of the so-called Sunday question, and self-contradictions of the Bible. The work shows the so-called divine authority for the supposed-holy day, to be the cunning device of designing priests rather than the inspiration of an Infinite God! This work, which we sell for the low price of fifty cents, and send the same free of postage on the receipt of the money, we will send to any old subscriber on receipt of seventy-five cents, together with the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL to any new subscriber on trial for three months; or, we will send the same work and the JOURNAL for three months on trial direct to a new subscriber, on the receipt of seventy-five cents. For one dollar, we will send for a new subscriber, the JOURNAL three months and the above-named book, together with that very remarkable book called LIFE'S UNFOLDINGS, or The Wonders of the Universe Revealed to Man.

We hope that every subscriber to whom we are now sending the JOURNAL will avail him or herself of this generous offer, and thus secure these books, as well as to thus aid in doubling the number of the subscribers to the JOURNAL.

MEDIUMS.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON.

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be: remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

MRS. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well who the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $2.00; each subsequent, $1.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $3; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

ROSICRUCIAN MUSINGS AND RAMBLINGS.

By F. B. Dowd.

THY is the watchword and the key-note to success in any direction.

What can't a man do if he will only try? The world is reveling in ignorance and blind idolatry to ideas of the past; bowing down and worshiping graven images, carved by master minds of the olden time, and called the word of God. Under the name of religion, men have become blind to the fact that they are doing the very thing that Moses forbade the Jews to to do—i. e., are worshiping graven images. An image is a picture or representation of something real, or a conception of the mind, and may be chiseled in stone, painted upon canvas, or pictured in words drawn by the pen.

Anything we consider holy and sacred we love, and that which we love, we worship. The orthodox worship the Bible, which they consider the word of God, and no man is more devilish or unholy in their estimation than the man who lays his polluted hands upon this sacred book to weaken or destroy its influence. It is equivalent to laying hands upon God and destroying his work among men. They reserve to themselves the right of interpretation, and deny the right to all others. That man is an infidel who says it was written by man, and hence must be man-made as any other book, and consequently has no claim or right to the word HOLY or DIVINE.

To say that it was written by inspiration, is only an excuse to inspire awe and frighten the timid from questioning their interpretations. How much inspiration does it require for a man towrite a history or tale of the past? How inspired one becomes in perusing the history of God's dealings with the Jews! Old Judah and his daughter-in-law by the wayside, or the writer of the story, may have been inspired, but where is the moral—where the lesson to be learned? What a glorious and soul-edifying picture of God is contained in the passage where he sends the Jews to sack a city, and put all the males, little children and mothers to the sword, but to save the virgins alive for their beastly lusts!

What a God-like family Lot'smust have been, who just after the awful destruction of Sodom, from which they were rescued by an angel of the Lord, indulged in a drunken debauch which would put to shame the most depraved inmates of modern brothels! Yet this, too, is sacred, and these the chosen of the Lord. But again I ask, where is the moral? Are we to do likewise?

It is a law of our nature and of our inmost being, that we become in very nature, mentally and spiritually, like the thing we love and worship. Indeed, our conception of God's character is the limit of our growth; our aspirations are all centered in the desire to be like our God. Hence, if we love soulless things, we become soulless also, for we are giving our souls, our lives, our affections, our all, to things that can give us nothing of real value in return. Thus we become empty and vacant, inviting disease, unrest, and discord, as vacuums invite the tornado.

An angry God creates angry people. Why? Because we have a right and are commanded in the Bible to be like God. God hates and takes vengeance on his enemies, and we have the same right. The orthodox are consistent in this, but forget the truly inspired utterance of him they murdered 1800 years ago, and are crucifying to-day, who said: "I say unto you that ye resist not evil." Go to now. "The world moves!" People are waking up. The ungodly are thinking, and religion is slowly resolving itself into a system of charity. Already the churches are accepting our grand doctrine of progress here and hereafter. Now is the time for work! What can't a man do if he will try!

Bro. A. E. Cram, a poor man in this world's goods, but rich in soul, and desire to do good to those around him, residing in Marshall County, Iowa, ten miles north of State Centre, wrote me some time since for my terms for a few lectures in the country. Upon ascertaining my terms, he went to work among "the ungodly," and by subscription raised the necessary funds to give some free lectures where no Spiritual lectures had ever been heard. The people turned out, orthodox and all, coming in wagons for ten miles around, to hear, out of curiosity, something of the monster Spiritualism. I led them gently, as a mother her tripping child. I let their castle alone, but showed them a gorgeous palace, and spread therein tables loaded with dainty and strong food whereat they nibbled. At the close of my first lecture, an orthodox begged for more lectures, and for that purpose secured the church, where I dispensed the gospel of peace. At the close o one lecture a gentleman (who I afterward learned was their minister) shook my hand and asked:

"Do your people admit the inspiration of the Bible?"

"Some portions of it—yes. But we make distinctions between imaginative and real soul-spired and inspiring utterances, which are rarely ever penned by the utterer. It needs no inspiration for a man to write what he has heard or seen; and hence the fallibility of human nature, manifest in the weakness of memory, must of necessity mingle with the real and the true, in this book as in all others. We only claim what you do, namely, the right of interpretation."

Much more I said, for which the gentleman thanked me and went his way.

At this church and at Chester Schoolhouse, Hardin County, eight miles distant, I spoke nine times to good and constantly increasing audiences.

Without wishing to "blow my own horn," I will say this, that there were none asleep at my lecture, and if Dame Rumor speaks truly, the orthodox got several morsels to digest which while they fail to sicken, are good for healthy thought. Thinking and discussing was the order of the day, in and out of the church. At the latter place I had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Bros. Bambo, A. Woodward, Thos. Henshaw, J. Tostevin, and others whose names I now forget—all bold, earnest thinkers, open and avowed Spiritualists. I almost forgot to mention good old Father Lundy. Born and bred among the Quakers, he has been a staunch pillar of this sect all his life, till now, in his declining years, because his great soul could not go down to feath—offered it a sparrow creed, his children in the Lord turned him out of the sanctuary where he loved to worship in brotherly love "as the spirit moved." But this he feels to be a great good, for, as he expressed it to me: "I feel free now."

The last Sunday I spoke there two loads of the Friends came from Iowa Falls, distant twenty-five miles, among whom were Brother and Sister Bump,—the latter a trance medium of rare powers,—and Brother and Sister Stevens; the last named a conscious clairvoyant, whose gifts are destined to do much good as she arises out of too much diffidence and distrust in her own self. I cannot speak in too high terms of these noble-hearted friends and liege of the true life. It was not like going among strangers to me, but more like a reunion of kindred spirits after long separation, and my muse suggests that we have met and worked together as brothers and sisters in the dead past.

The friends at Chester Schoolhouse, four miles from Union, on the Iowa Central Railroad want the services of a good trance lecturer and test medium to follow me.

I have opened the way for much good, brother and sister lecturers, in that place. Give them a call. You will be welcome to rest and work as you like. Write to Charles Henshaw, Union, Iowa, or call in person. As for me I wait and work, only asking to be kept busy in just such places as this last place. To this end I wish to make the acquaintance of Spiritualists in Northern Missouri. My address is Wellsville, Missouri.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

By Wm. B. Fahnestock.

HENRY T. CHILD, M. D.,—DEAR DOCTOR: In your remarks upon clairvoyance, you say that there are three sources of knowledge to persons in that state. "First, that which is mixed with knowledge of the individual. Second, the impressions of positive minds upon the spirit which is in a negative condition, and is unable to distinguish between these and its own impressions. And thirdly, sympathy, which has been supposed to be a part of clairvoyance, when in reality it is only a physical condition."

There can be no doubt that in clairvoyance-as well as in the powers of the other senses, it is the soul or the spirit of the individual that perceives, hears, tastes, smells or feels, and that as the spirit is combined with matter, or is in a perfectly normal condition, so will the power of seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling or feeling be less clear-minded, simply, because it requires that the faculties of the individual should be in a state of statuvolence to do so at all, and as that condition is perfect or not, so will the power of seeing, etc., be perfect or not—and the more completely the soul is enabled to separate or abstract itself from the physical body, the more perfect will its clear-minded powers be.

Secondly, I must also insist, that when ideas are received from the minds of men or from spirits out of the body, that the faculties of the individual are not in a negative condition. On the contrary, they are active, and to see, hear or feel, etc., at all, they must be so.

The faculties may be passive, without being negative, and must be active when they are receptive.

Thirdly, I must also insist, that if the faculties are clear-minded at all, there can be no use for sympathy. The chord of our musical instrument, effects another by absolute aerial vibrations, and not by sympathy, which is only another name for animal magnetism.

It is true that pain felt by one individual may be experienced by another, who is clear-minded, or whose sense of feeling, feels what is felt by another (as in tasting, they can taste what another tastes, by reading the mind), but the faculties of the same person can also feel pain where none is felt by others, and if they can feel as well, where none is felt, it cannot be sympathy in any case, and must be a power in the sense of feeling to obtain knowledge or feel, as the clairvoyant perceives an idea, by reading the mind. This proves that they can feel what they create, as well as they can see what they imagine, but their creating the one or seeing the other thus, does not (when their mind is properly directed) prevent them, from truly seeing or feeling that which is real.

With respect to cultivating the power of memory, or of bringing the consciousness of one state into the other, I have but to say, that if the mind is determined to do so, all that transpires in the state of statuvolence can be remembered when the individual comes out of it, and if you were requested, when in the condition to remember all that had transpired in your previous sittings, you would certainly remember all that you had ever experienced or seen in your various rambles throughout space or in the spirit world.

A proper direction of your mind while in that state once, would hold good ever afterwards; that is, after that, you would always remember, simply because the necessity of doing so would be familiar or known to you in both states.

There can be no doubt (when persons are in this condition) that spirits can communicate, impress, or present scenes or ideas to the faculties of the statuvolist, but it is no psychological power in them, but a power in the faculties of the individual to attend to, perceive, judge, reflect upon and remember, what has been presented. The power of presenting scenes or pictures belongs to spirits, and like men they may present ideas, which the faculties of the statuvolist may recognize if he desires to do so, but, under no conditions whatever (when he has been properly taught) must he do so, if he does not wish to.

An examination of the lady's case (referred to in your article) could have been made at a distance if the necessary conditions had been present, but, as they perhaps were not so at the time, the spirits presented a picture of the lady's stomach, and as you could see the picture, and hear any suggestions that were made, you could of course use your own judgment as to what might be proper in her case, independent of any imaginary psychological power.

This is especially the case with persons when they have been taught the true nature of their condition, but under other circumstances, they generally only see, hear or act, as they have been taught or believe that they must.

Letter from Mrs. E. A. Blair.

BROTHER JONES:—While I was in Manchester, N. H., I wrote you in reference to our intentions of visiting the West this fall; but now I see no possible way to reach that section for the present. We are still in Maine, working for the good of humanity. In one small village, I and husband were invited to stop with the family of a staunch Methodist, a class leader, whose object, no doubt, was to learn of what material mediums were composed, for my husband is one as well as myself. We remained two weeks, giving perfect satisfaction to all,—no one going away without spirit friends being described and names given.

I found the Maine people far more progressive than those of my own State, Vermont, and they are kind, generous and hospitable, and as we pass from one town to another, we find many friends whom we leave with regret. Mr. Mansler, three years ago, could be called the only artist who would take spirit pictures. Now they can be counted by the dozen, and in a variety of phases. I wish to give you an account of a spirit picture taken by Samuel Moore, of Ellsworth, Maine,—my husband sitting. Black Eagle, my Indian control, told Mr. E. A. Blair (my husband) that Nettie wanted him to go and sit for her face." He went as requested, and no less than seven watched him prepare his plate, it being a tintype. The face appeared, but not as distinct as we wished, and the next morning we were invited to sit together. We started, and when on our way from Lawyer Burnham's where we were boarding, the spirit of my husband's mother said to me, "Return to the house, for you are wanted there, and if you go you will not meet with success." With more than unusual reluctance, I turned back, feeling how small I was,—not even could I have individuality to go when I pleased for a little recreation, and on returning, I found an old lady had walked three miles to have a sitting with me —but age seventy-eight years, and a Calvinist Baptist in belief. The result of the sitting was this. She said, "Mrs. Blair, John lives and has come to me, and has brought the other children, giving all their names." The picture represented herself, spirit husband, and living children, by the number of roses and buds. Many other friends came and were described, giving their names and the business here in earth life, and the diseases they passed away with. I will send a printed extract written for the Monitor that will save time in writing, and will tell the results of Mr. Blair's sitting at Mr. S. Moore's gallery. He can take the faces of a friend with out their being present, and has done so many times. He often calls people from the street, and tells them that a friend has asked them to come, and sit for a picture. As yet he has taken no pay for his work. I have never seen so perfect a face by any other artist as the one taken by S. Moore. There is not the least shadow of deception on his part, for he will allow from one to a dozen to watch the process of preparing and developing his picture.

Dexter Maine, Sept. 19, 1871.

But a short time since, Mr. Mumler of Boston, was the only artist who could take pictures of persons who have passed into spirit life. Now they are coming all over the country, not only in photograph saloons but in windows. Last week in Ellsworth, Me, Mr. E. A. Blair went to Mr. Moore's saloon to have a picture taken. When it was developed there was found upon the plate, a perfect likeness of a young lady friend of Mr. Blair's, who died many years since, and of whom no likeness was in existence until this was given. While recognizing the picture, Mr. Blair felt dissatisfied because the young lady used to wear her hair flowing in her neck, while in the picture it was done up. Upon going home, before he had spoken of having the picture at all—his wife, entranced by Black Eagle, spoke to him saying, "Nettie thought she would have her hair done up before she had her picture taken." This satisfied Mr. Blair. Can more convincing proof immortality and of communion of spirit be furnished? And yet the Reverend Clergymen in their pulpits, dare to call our loved ones "devils."

Communications from H. S. Johnson.

I am pleased with the position you take in regard to mediums. You advise people not to report, or believe mediums bad, until they are tried, and if mediums, themselves, would take the position you do, not finding fault with one another, for all mediums are fallible, and more they are the Christ's bearing the burdens of the people and are not understood. If mediums would live according to the light they receive, which is peace on earth, good will to man, the year of jubilee would soon appear; and now in regard to the "Search after God." Is" there an omniscient God? Is there an All Power? Is there a God that has aught to do with this planet? Does God answer prayer, directly or indirectly? In the first place, we will give you the experience of a spirit, who went into the Spirit World a High Priest to the Sun, before the font of an European ever pressed American soil. He entered the Spirit World and found his friends standing by him. He asked a very dear friend, "Where is Deity? His friend responded to his desire, gave him to understand that he had not yet seen him; but he had seen that which would very much please him. He and his friend traveled from place to place, until they came to a very exalted sphere. Here they asked the inhabitants, if they could point them to Deity? They answered that they had not seen such a personage in form, yet there evidently was such in existence. They still continued their journeyings, until they came to those who had the control of the atmosphere, and those who had charge of agriculture, and those who had the control of the sciences. Finally, they came to those who had congregated to form a Congress for the government of this planet, and they asked them, where Deity was. The Congress of spirits told them, they had not seen Deity in form; yet there evidently was such a personage. Then they saw a little to one side of this Congress where it parted them—there was a large gathering of spirits of great intellect, spirits with comprehensive thinking powers. Either one of these, if seen by the earth children at the present time, would be considered the Lord God of the Bible; spirits who understood all earthly science and the science of the spheres up to their present condition. They were distressing for the evidence of a Deity. One party said, there evidently is a God, the other party said, we see no evidence of a Deity—with all our investigations up to the present time we see no evidence that one exists. The other party said, "In all our investigations up to the present time we find conclusive evidence of a Deity. This spirit's dear friend said to him, "What shall we do now? Shall we give up our investigations? He answered, "As for me I endorse the party who say there evidently is a Deity—for I can see the evidence of one in the lowest strata of earth, on up to the intellect of man." These two friends traveled from this planet to other planets. They found on the planet Jupiter, intellects whose capacity for thought was so much superior to their own, they could not comprehend their meaning. But they heard those lofty personages, whose heavenly countenances was beyond expression,—whose knowledge was beyond the comprehension of man, say, there was a Deity behind these revolving worlds who upheld and sustained them. Then these friends went back to their own sphere to do the work that was allotted to them, which was to elevate the race of man from destroying one another, and the upbuilding of harmony. Now the question, Is there an omniscient God? In response to this we will say that the laws of nature seem to be perfect. If you throw the cork into the water it will rise to the top. If you throw a pebble into the water, it quickly goes to the bottom. If a man severs an artery, the blood soon flows freely from the body and the chemical composition soon dissolves and the spirit readily enters the sphere he has labored for. If you try to put it too high, it will sink; if you put it too low it will rise—like the pebble and the cork. If an individual transgresses any law in the minutest part, he receives the penalty. If an individual walks according to the laws of nature, he receives according to his walk, even to the minutest part; therefore, there evidently is an omniscient God.

ITEMS.

From Lois Waisbrooker.

BROTHER JONES: I think you could not have received my last "Items," or you would have noticed Brother Whiting's resurrection. I wrote you immediately after the funeral, and as the friends there knew it, they will be surprised to see nothing in reference to the new birth of this faithful worker in your columns. The friends here at Almont after looking through your last issue, began to hope that the report they had heard was a mistake. On Sunday, Sep. 3rd, Brother A. B. Whiting came on to the ground near Albion where the annual pic-nic was held, in company with his mother and sister, just before the time for the afternoon lecture. They were warmly greeted by the friends, who had feared that Brother W. would not be able to be present at all. In reply to a request that he would make a few remarks, he said, "I can not talk more than five minutes," but he did speak at least, fifteen, closing with a poem, the burden of which was, "It is only a question of time." His words were full of hopeful courage for our cause, and I heard him say afterward that he felt none the worse for the effort. On Monday, Sept. fourth, about half past two o'clock, he passed with scarcely a moment's warning to the other shore. His funeral was held at the house on the Wednesday following, attended by a large concourse of friends, Miss Susie M. Johnson giving the discourse, followed by remarks from Parker Pillsbury.

WHAT SPIRITUALISM HAS DONE?

This gentleman said that Spiritualists had done what no other class of people had ever been able to do; they had caught death, bound him and robbed him of his sting. That if the world could not look to Spiritualism for the saviors of this age, he did not know where it could look; that they had more vitality than any other one class, and he did not know but more than all other classes put together.

NOT A SPIRITUALIST.

And, at the same time, said that he was not a Spiritualist, had never associated himself with them. Still he is speaking for a Spiritualist Society, is being paid out of Spiritualists' pockets —well paid at that.

YOUR TYPE

made a mistake in giving the name of the inventor of that Grain Binder. It is Lotteridge instead of Hottridge. I lay it to the typo, because Mrs. Andrews is too well acquainted with the gentleman to mistake his name, and in my last article my first name is spelled Louis, instead of Lois, thus putting me in the condition of the Irishman who did not know whether it was "he self or his brother." I would not mind it, only I don't wish to be mistaken for a man, that I don't; so please tell your readers that its myself and not my brother. Now don't think I am finding fault, for I wonder that typo's do as well as they do.

I LIKE

Wilson's department this week, for it does seem sometimes as though Spiritualist's were willing to be kicked by their inferior superiors, if they can only get an occasional pat on the back. Familiar pats from assumed superiority are simply insults; real superiority does not deal in such patting. I sometimes feel as though Spiritualists loved to pay a premium on cowardly meanness. The slightest suspicion that one has a secret leaning toward Spiritualism, is enough to secure the patronage of three, if not of four fifths of the Spiritualists everywhere; (I of course mean the everywhere's that have come under my observation) for instance, a

"FEMALE DOCTRESS"

that is what she called herself, came to Charles City last summer. I suppose by that, there must be male doctresses. Well, she was evidently a medium, but an unreliable one; that is she made some egregious blunders, and did some cures. She claimed that Jesus gave her the power she possessed, and in answer to prayer, utterly repudiating Spiritualism, becoming indignant if it was even hinted that she had any such proclivities in that direction; but what did Spiritualists do and say. "Oh, she's a Spiritualist, but if she owned it she could not get the church people's custom." This is what they said, and as to doing, of course I do not know positively, but have good reason to believe, from what came under my observation, that they paid her twice as much money as they would have done had she declared herself a medium. And I feel quite certain that they, in that case, would have criticised her blunders more sharply, and at half the rate of charges, would have called her mercenary. But this is not a pleasant picture to dwell upon, if it is a true one, so I will turn to a fairer. I had the pleasure of listening to in Port Huron last Sabbath. I hope to have that same pleasure renewed many times in the future; for she is an able and interesting speaker as is well-known to all who have heard her.

"Where the share is deepest driven,
The best fruits grow."

Letter from H. S. Brown, M. D.

DEAR JOURNAL:—I have had a conversation with Mrs. Carrie B. Wright, of 440 East Water Street, in this city, who recently visited Chicago, and says some things of the mediums of your city that I think worthy of note. She went to the room of Charles A. Rose, the spirit artist. She had her picture taken by him, and on the same plate are the pictures of two persons; one of them she recognizes as that of a sister who is in the Spirit World. Mrs. Wright saw the two faces before the plate was removed, and after while her husband could not see them when requested to look by her; but when the pictures were developed, there were the two faces, the same as she saw them in the camera. She considers this a good test of spirit presence as well as of Mr. Rose's honesty regarding the taking of spirit pictures, and a test also of the tangible presence of spirits, that all the verbiage of theologions can not overcome, because there is her spirit sister's picture, that is plain and unmistakable to her and the artist could not have obtained it only by spirit power.

Mrs. Wright also visited Mrs. Maud Lord at the hospitable house of Mr. Eaton, on West Madison Street, where the most pleasant and satisfactory results of spirit presence were manifested; and we hope to see her in this city, as she spoke of visiting Milwaukee soon. Everything about the seance was as fair as it could be, and the manifestations were so vivid and varied, that all honest skeptics would be convinced of spirit presence, or a power that is unknown to them making the manifestations. It was impossible for Mrs. Lord to make them.

Mrs. Wright's visit among the mediums and friends of Spiritualism in Chicago, was one of delight to her, and will long be remembered with pleasure. I should judge by her description. Hoping that we shall have an outpouring of the divine spirit in Milwaukee soon that will make all true hearts glad, I remain yours in the bonds of love.

Milwaukee, Wis., Sept. 12th, 1871.

Voices from the People.

PRINCETON, IND.—M. Morris writes.—I will now say that the dear old JOURNAL has been my most highly prized and welcome visitor,—bringing food to my mind, joy to my heart and light to my spirit,—so that amid all my affliction, I have been happy in reading it.

HAMILTON, NEB.—Mrs. Annie Bush writes.—I value the JOURNAL above all other papers I have ever taken. Did not see the first few numbers containing good Brother Francis' "Search after God," therefore, it you publish it in book form, I must certainly have it. The "Search" suits me exactly. I had long since discarded the orthodox God, and was trying to find one that I could better comprehend. Am following Brother Francis' "Search."

BYRON, ILL.—George Sherman writes.—Please find three dollars inclosed for your excellent paper for the current year. I should be lonesome without it, having virtually been a Spiritualist for forty years. Spiritualism is the oldest and really the foundation of all kinds of religion, but the world is loth to acknowledge it. We get no knowledge of a future state, except through it, and were it not for it, I should be a skeptic of the deepest dye. I claim to be a wayside preacher, but not moved perceptibly by any spirit power. Can believe more of the Bible than I could before becoming a Spiritualist. Am now seventy-three years of age, and hope to live and die a philosopher.

OAKFIELD, CENTRE, WIS.—S. S. Rosier writes. You will find three dollars inclosed for my last year's subscription, which expired the first of July. Had thought I should not be able to take it another year, but now feel quite up, for it is my meat and drink; and without it I should be lost. I am an old man, can not work much, and look for your valuable paper as a child looks for food when hungry. My means are very limited, but think I can take it another year and will pay in six months if I can; if not, will at the expiration of the year.

GRATTAN, MICH.—Mrs. Jennie Story writes.—For three months the JOURNAL has visited me—a light to my pathway it has proved to be; it has brought beautiful thoughts to mind; it has driven doubts away which I can not again find.

STREETSBORO, OHIO.—L. Russell writes.—I like the paper for the bold and independent stand it takes in favor of liberal principles in general; and above all, for its liberality in spiritual and religious matters. The doctrine of the spirituality of the soul is now attracting the attention of the most studious and apt thinking minds throughout the civilized world, and I am satisfied, is worthy of the most serious consideration of all who desire a happy and glorious immortality beyond the confines of this life.

NEPHI CITY, UTAH.—T. J. Schofield writes.—I thank you for your kindness in sending me the paper on credit, and assure you that I would not like to be without it on any account, although some one steals some of the numbers out of the mail. Have just got number twenty-three this afternoon, but have not got number one, number twenty one and twenty-two for the two weeks previous. Am very much interested in the "Search after God," and feel quite disappointed when a number is missing. Think it is the best of any paper that I take; to me it contains the best of life every week, and as long as it continues as good as at present, shall continue to love and pay for it. I would inform you that Spiritualism in Utah is slowly winding its way into the hearts of the people. I hear of circles being formed in Mormon families, for spirit manifestations, both north and south, in this territory. A Mormon sister told me last Sunday, that she, with her husband and family had been on a visit to her sister, near Ogden, W. T. Her sister, she informed me, was a medium, had held circles and received many manifestations; was communicated to from a boy of hers that died in Southern Utah some time ago; and had seen a stool dance and spin on the floor without human aid, and lifted upon her knees. She said that she had found out that both her husband and herself are mediumistic, which she did not know before. As for myself, I am a thorough convert to the Harmonial Philosophy.

PORTLAND, IND.—D. C. Baker writes.—Am ashamed of myself for not sending pay for the paper when my three months expired, but "better late than never" they say. I have been, and have been, taking the Banner of Light for several years, yet it is almost impossible to have too much of a good thing, therefore I send you a money order to pay for the JOURNAL and one dollar for widow's fund for the paper coming free.

NEWPORT, OHIO.—T. Gregory writes.—Find inclosed three dollars to apply on my subscription for one year. If this does not reach you in time to get number twenty seven, send it to make the connection. I do not want to miss a number on account of the "Search after God." It is light—that worth the whole price of the paper. Have but one paper on hand, having distributed them among my neighbors, and will still circulate them, and see what I can do the way you do. I have been a Spiritualist for the last twenty years or more.

CENTRALIA, ILL.—J. Evarts writes.—The dark clouds of superstition still encompass the pyramids of Modern Egypt; yet a ray of truth occasionally makes its way through the dense fog. Old theology is waning, and a new and better one is in many other places, only that its seams are closer and its fit more perfect, that is, "it hath ears and hears not; it hath eyes and sees not." But it has a sword that will stab in the dark, and a tongue as forked and venomous as a serpent. The light of Spiritualism has shown at times with much brilliancy upon this place; but not with power to penetrate the dark places and unite the scattered particles of the progressive element. But there is much of plastic mind here waiting for an impression of higher and better thought. The theories of Spiritualism have been well displayed before the people here, by Wilson and others but the clamor is still unabated, and where is your proof? I am constrained to bring restrictions upon the advertisement of Doherty and Pursell. The style of the advertisement alone is quite sufficient to cause strangers to say (as I have) "I'll not waste time to send a picture, but does not say what kind. It says to parties at a distance to state "the day and hour they wish a trial"—but does not say what is required of them. "Money refunded if no result is obtained." Now, what would "no result" be? If they send me my picture with a shadow by it, must I receive it, whether recognized or not? This is indefinite, and has the ring of irresponsibility; and a few such failures as this will make money without better assurance of security. I speak in brotherly kindness, and for the advancement of truth.

Remarks:—Those who eternally peck away at the outside of the shell and cry out "humbug," seldom get at the meat within.

We suppose that spirit friends are sufficiently near to those who send for likenesses to often know of such desires and are on hand at the hour fixed upon.

One would naturally infer that the artists refer to the photograph of the party who sends for the spirit likeness. We understand that the spirit artist means by "a result," a spirit likeness, but they do not pledge themselves that it shall be identified.

Of that they could not have any evidence. They guarantee a spirit picture or no pay, as we understand it.

Mediums have rights, as well as patrons. A genuine spirit likeness is valuable to have in one's possession, even if it be not recognized. All the artists can do is to develop and send such likenesses as appear on the plate. They have no power to say what spirit likeness shall be taken—then why not pay him for such a result? "Is not the laborer worthy of his hire?" He supports his gallery, furnishes chemicals, plates and time, pays postage, etc., etc. All should look at the business department of mediumship, and do unto mediums as you would like to be done by under similar circumstances.

Brother Evarts, we perceive, calls out these remarks for the benefit of that class who are eternally finding fault with something—professional mindfinders.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF CREATION

NEW EDITION—REVISED AND CORRECTED.

THE VOICES

Three Poems.

VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.
VOICE OF NATURE.
VOICE OF A PEBBLE.

By Warren Sumner Barlow.

THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is destined to make deeper inroads among sectarian bigots than any work that has hitherto appeared.

The Voice of Superstition takes the creeds at their word, and proves by numerous passages from the Bible that the God of Moses has been defeated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Calvary!

The Voice of Nature represents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While others have too often only demolished, this author has erected a beautiful Temple on the ruins of Superstition. Judge Baker, of New York, in his review of this poem, says: "It will unquestionably cause the author to be classed among the ablest and most gifted didactic poets of the age."

The Voice of a Pebble delineates the individuality in matter and Mind, fraternal Charity and Love.

The book is a repository of original thought, awaking noble conception of God and man, forcible and pleasing in style, and is one of the few works that will grow with its years and mature with the centuries. It is already admired by its thousands of readers.

Printed in beautiful type, on heavy, fine paper, bound in beveled boards, in good style; nearly 200 pages. Price $1.25, postage 16 cents. Very liberal discount to the trade.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.

A MANUAL OF

SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

By Hudson Tuttle.

WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. PRICE $2.00; Postage 24c.

This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.

Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.

While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is waking the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every door.

With the Gods.

We are sad to-day, but will not complain, at the loss our cause has sustained in the apotheosis of our brother, A. B. Whiting. He was with us but the other day, and made our souls leap with joy, as his inspired brain overflowed with song, poetry, and argument. To-day, he is with the Gods, meet companion for the great souls of the Spirit World. We knew him well, and in knowing him, we learned to love him—not that we agreed on all points of doctrines and law, but in the fact that we were brothers in a common cause.

Brother Whiting leaves behind him a clear, consistent record in Spiritualism. True as the the needle to our cause, faithful in his obligations as a speaker, and never stooping to chicanery as a medium, he has passed on in a halo of glorious light to a happier and better life.

We last met Bro. Whiting in Louisville, Ky., at the house of Bro. Turner; it was in Dec., 1870. It was a dark, stormy day. He was sick, —very sick, and yet with a mighty will power, he was doing brave battle with his disease. He was cheerful, and yet there was a shadow on his brow. We then felt that our brother was not to be with us long. During a few moments of private conversation, he said in answer to a question, "I shall soon be about again, and if not, I have no fear—all is well. I shall not tarry in the grave, but beyond, where the green fields of the Summer Land are, you and I will meet again."

Then came the hand shaking and the final good-by. We parted, dear brother, to meet no more in the form; but we shall meet again,—you and I,—in the great world of spirits. May we meet to continue our earth acquaintance into an eternal spiritual friendship.

Brothers, you of us who are in the field as teachers, one of our number has gone on to the spheres, and in his report of progress here below, let him say that we are as one man, working in harmony for the good of all. Once before I held out the olive branch of peace and good-will—some did not respect it, and now I hold it out once again over the safe in which we have deposited the body of our dear Brother Whiting, and in the presence of his enfranchised soul ask you to respect it. We will not be the first to mar the dawning happiness of our brother's new life.

To his dear sister and sorrowing friends, we send greetings. Your loss of his physical presence is his eternal spiritual gain.

And now in this hour of our solemn gladness, let us exclaim,

Too sacred is that shade for hate:
Heaven's rainbow in his heart is shrined
With an unselfish joy, that Fate
From earth hath taken one more of our kind.
Nor is the shade with robe and crown,
In such world-blessing love alone,
For Whiting and hosts bown down
In thanks before the great Just One.

Our Second Visit to Iowa and Minnesota, Aug. 18th, 1871.

To day we leave for Maquoketa, Jackson County, Iowa. Maquoketa is a fine little town, with railroad connection with the C. & N. W. Iowa Branch Junction at Clinton. We reached there at six o'clock in the evening, and then rode six miles into the country to the farm house of Brother Bradway, remaining with him Saturday and Sunday, the 16th and 20th, lecturing four times in Estate schoolhouse to as many human beings as could well pack themselves into the building. On Sunday we lectured in a grove to many people. We gave one matinee that was well attended. During our stay we gave many fine tests and readings of character. A family group of four spirits came to an elderly lady with words of cheer. They were described and fully identified. We believe the woman was an Adventist.

We made the acquaintance of many true and warm hearted friends, of whom we remember the Bradways, the Stevens, Grays, and others with pleasure. Herald, the last a soldier friend. Major Belden, now editing a paper in the town of Maquoketa. God grant that his life may be smoother, and his lines cast in more pleasant places than when in the army.

Mrs. Stevens is a very fine medium, and one who, if she could take her place in our ranks as a seer and speaker, would rank with the best of us before the world.

There is a very fine cave, with picturesque scenery, two miles from Estate schoolhouse, well worth a visit from all who go to Maquoketa. There is also a very fine natural bridge of rock connected with the cave, that in the future will command the attention of pleasure seekers.

Monday, Aug. 25th, we left by stage for Dubuque at six o'clock, rode forty-seven miles, reaching Dubuque at six o'clock in the evening. Stopped at the Tremont House. We suffered severely from the bill of fare presented us by the mosquitoes—social and musical guests of the Tremont House.

Tuesday, August 22nd, we left Dubuque at seven o'clock, for Independence, Iowa. Here we lectured and gave tests three evenings, to small but intelligent audiences.

We found many old friends here, whom we were glad to take by the hand. We lectured in Wilcox's New Hall, a fine one and cleanly, with a gentleman janitor. Made our home at the house of Brother and Sister Patrick, of whom we can say that Spiritualism has none in its ranks truer and more faithful than our good Brother and Sister P. They were both absent during our visit, but their places were well and worthily filled by Walter and Carrie, son and sister of Mr. and Mrs. P. How well we fared and enjoyed ourselves at Independence—it is only just to say we went away satisfied.

Friday, August 25th, we went to Cedar Falls. Tarried with Brother F. A. Crause. Lectured to full houses four times. (Gave one afternoon matinee to one hundred and forty people.) We gave fifty tests, fifty-nine of which were identified on the spot.

The cause of Spiritualism is gaining ground in Independence and Cedar Falls. Few places in Iowa hold forth better inducements for investment of capital than Cedar Falls. Situated in the midst of a fine agricultural and grazing country, with one of the finest water powers in the State, it can not fail of becoming an important point. There are three railroads running in and out, making it a fine railroad connection with East, West, North and South.

Monday, August 28th, we left Cedar Falls for Shell Rock, situated northwest of Cedar Falls, on the Shell Rock River. It has a good water power, well improved. There is a new railroad, just completed to this point. The Spiritualists are organized here and are doing a good work. May they continue in well doing.

Here we lectured four times to good audiences, save on the first night, when the audience was small; it being a dull, rainy night.

We gave many tests here, and made some failures, or what may be called failures. One or two tests given at the time, dated: Subsequent-ly proved to be correct, we do not think we did as well at Shell Rock as at the other places we had visited.

August 31st, we left for Waverly at ten o'clock in the evening, in an open wagon, over the prairie on our road to Minneola; up all night. At Waverly we rested an hour or two with Brother Colvers, the host and chief mover, president pro tem Society of Spiritualists in Shell Rock,—a nice man.

Friday, Sept. 1st, 1871, at half past seven o'clock in the morning we found ourself, in company with a dozen others, obliged to lie over five-and-a-half hours, to accommodate the monopoly of the great contending railroad companies, the Iowa division of the Illinois Central, and the Minnesota division of the Milwaukee and St. Paul R. R. These two great companies, largely endowed with land grants and money gifts, have little in common with the interests of the people. The time, however, is not far distant when the people will take measures in to their own hands, and right these wrongs! We, the people, know well the necessity for railroads, and we also know that capital is a mighty power, but we also know that whirlwinds, deluges and earthquakes are not in the habit of respecting the rich or poor, and never halt to count the cost. So with the whirlwinds of human passions, when let loose, and from the signs we meet and see all over the land, we opine that there is a whirlwind of human passions brewing, that will sweep down upon these monopolies one of these days, that will make them feel that the people are something besides serfs, to be crushed beneath the Juggernaut of capital.

At twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes, the train from Mason City, Iowa, for St. Paul, Minnesota, came in sight, and at twenty minutes past two we were off, changing care at Austin and Farmington; we reached Lake City, situated on Lake Pepin, Upper Mississippi, a most beautiful sheet of water, twenty-five miles long. This lake affords one of the finest fishing grounds in the northwest. The lake proper is an expansion of the Mississippi River, from three to five miles wide, is dotted with islands, and surrounded by bluffs from two hundred to three hundred feet in hight. From the highest of these bluffs we have a fine bird's eye view of one of the finest landscapes in the world. There lie spread out before us, forests, hills, promontories, bluffs, prairies, streams, the Father of Rivers, dotted with steamers, sail boats, rafts and the canoe. Along its west bank the railroad, with its mighty trains of cars freighted with the commerce of the world!

The most prominent landmarks are Sugar Loaf on the west, and Maiden Rock, on the east side of the river. Maiden Rock has an interesting and romantic but sad story to relate to each passer-by, a true tale of Indian life:

Winona, a beautiful girl of Wabasha's tribe, loved a young hunter and promised to become his bride. Her parents, like too many in Christian lands, were ambitious, and promised her to a distinguished young warrior who had smitten masefully the hostile Chippewas. The maiden refused the hand of the brave, and clung to the fortunes of the hunter, who had been driven to the wilderness by menaces of death. The family were encamped on Lake Pepin, in the shadow of the great rock. Starting like the frightened fawn at the cruel announcement, she swiftly climbed to the summit of the cliff, and there, with bitter words, reproached her friends for their cruelty to the hunter and her own heart. She then commenced singing her dirge. The relenting parents, seeing the peril of their child, brought her to come down and take her hunter lover for a husband. But the maiden too well knew the treachery that was hidden in their promises, and when her dirge was ended she leaped from the lofty pinnacle and fell among the rocks and shrubbery at its base, a martyr to true affection.

Sanctification Don't save.

Mr. D. W Campbell, a respectable merchant of Albany, has, within the past seven years, been robbed of about $20,000 by his confidential clerk, Mr. Ira B. Schuyler. Mr. Schuyler, having been detected at last, has refunded about one-third of the money. He was considered a most amiable and religious person, and at one time held office in that admirable society known as the Y. M. C. A.

The saving ordinance of Christianity does not change the propensity to steal—"it is a means of grace," that serves as a passport to an orthodox's heaven. "Morality," they say, "is dangerous."—It is only "the love of Jesus that can save from endless perdition." It is a remarkable fact that almost all the convicts in various prisons in the world are devout believers in a Devil, Hell-torments, and the blood of Christ as a means of salvation—hence "they roll sin as a sweet morsel under their tongues" until the last moment, when the accounts can be balanced by a simple ejaculation, "O Jesus—God have mercy on my soul!" "Consistency, thou art a jewel." Common sense is never consulted in the making up of church dogmas and creeds —"Great is the mystery of godliness" is their motto.

Widow's and Orphan's Fund.

Mrs. M. J. Gould, of Hermitage, Cal., donates two dollars to the above-named fund, to aid in sending the JOURNAL free to the poor of that class.

Many thanks dear sister—angels will bless you for your generosity.

Bro. D. C. BAKER, of Portland, Ind., donates one dollar to the Widow's and Orphan's Fund. Many thanks, dear brother, in behalf of that class your donation is intended for.

Mr. James Choate.

The above-named youthful lecturer and medium is yet in Chicago, and can be addressed in care of this office.

Mr. Choate is a fine speaker, and a most excellent test medium. He will accept invitations to go to adjacent cities and towns, to speak and hold test seances.

J. E. Perring.

Our friends in the city who are buyers, and our friends in the country who wish to send articles of produce to Chicago to be sold, will do well to read Bro. Perring's advertisement in this number of the JOURNAL. He is an honorable man, and will deal fairly with his patrons.

Premiums.

The publisher of the Illustrated Phrenological Journal is offering most liberal premiums for clubs to his popular and useful Magazine. By paying $1.00 in cash, and sending only a small number of subscribers, you can secure a first class $55.00 Grover and Baker Sewing Machine. A more liberal offer cannot be made, and the inducements to offer to the sub-

LITERARY.

The Life that now is. By Robert Collyer; author of "Nature and Life." Boston: Horace B. Fuller; Chicago: Western News Co.

We ought to have noticed this book at an earlier date, and our delay is not from want of appreciation of the work or its author. "The Life that now is," is the very happy title that Mr. Collyer has given to a collection of sixteen of his sermons, originally delivered before the congregation of the Unitarian Church in this city, over which he has charge. Any man who can command the very great love and respect, not only of his church, but of all who have the pleasure of his acquaintance that Mr. Collyer does, must possess noble qualities of head and heart that will make his sermons pleasing and instructive to all, even though they may not deem his religious belief sound. The three sermons, entitled respectively, Children and Childhood; Tender, Trusty and True, and Patience, are perfect gems.

Only performance of Herve's charming comic opera, "Little Faust;" Mrs. J. A. Oates as Mephisto, supported by the entire excellent company. Friday—Benefit of Mrs. J. A. Oates.

This cozy little theatre having been thoroughly repainted and refitted during the summer months, is now one of the most attractive places of amusement in the city.

COL. WOOD'S MUSEUM.

Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, September 28th, 29 h, and 30 h, "Speed the Plow." Saturday Matinee, "Lady of Lyons."

In addition to the regular dramatic bill, this resort is furnished with one of the largest collection of curiosities in the country.

DEARBORN THEATRE.

Everything new. The unrivalled Dearborn Minstrels. The excruciating burlesque, with every member of the company in a specialty, entitled the "The Theatrical Agency." The wonderful song and dance man, Andy McKee. New ballads by the great quintette. Seats secured six days in advance.

Dearborn Theatre has justly won for itself the reputation of being old reliable in all matters pertaining to negro minstrelsy.

ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

Among the other numerous attractions at this eminent art gallery, is now to be found the "Battle of Gettysburg," one of the very best paintings ever placed on exhibition in this country. We advise all lovers of the beautiful and grand to see it without fail before it leaves the city. 66 Adams street. Admission 25 cents.

Mrs. Robinson's Tobacco Antidote.

The most certain and perfectly harmless antidote for the poisonous effects, and remedy for the tobacco appetite, is known by the above name.

It is compounded by Mrs. A. H. Robinson, the celebrated medium of Chicago, while entranced by a celebrated chemist, long in spirit life. This antidote is warranted to break the habit of using tobacco by the inveterate lover of the weed, when the directions (on each box) are followed.

Agents for selling the same throughout the country are wanted. For sale, wholesale and retail, at this office. Price $3.00 per box—sent by mail free of postage, on receipt of the money.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE,

A Book for the Age and the Times,

and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.

You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet the arguments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.

It discusses the matter of Bible canons, versions, translations and revisions with ability, citing none but authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.

The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley.

It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.

The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for nearly the whole of the first edition before it was published, one party alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.

Price, $1.50; postage, 20 cents.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had its class. It is written for women; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for our lady indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in what can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:

"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

Price, $1.50; postage, 16 cents. Address RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 S. Clark street, Chicago.

The term of office of five of the trustees expires at this time namely—James M. Shumway, Wm. H. Jones, Mary Beans, A. May Wise, and Asa Rogers.

We recommend that the meeting nominate persons for these vacancies and appoint tellers.

By the charter the time for the election is fixed for the 1st Monday in October, and we suggest that the polls close to-morrow afternoon at 6 o'clock.

The Crucible.

We are glad to learn, is in a flourishing condition. We clip the following from the number of Sept. 30th:

With this number commences volume two of the Crucible. We make no promises for the present volume, only that we shall as in the past, do the best we can. We hope that experience will prove a teacher so that each volume can be an improvement on the past. We, editors and printers, shall do all we can to give you a paper which is not only thoroughly alive to Spiritualism, but to all the reforms of the age, as well.

We have made a few changes in the management of the Crucible, deciding that a cosmopolitan journal should all be cosmopolites, we have taken out the North-Western Department, and have invited its editor to become an assistant editor of the whole paper, and fire away with the same zeal that characterized his editorials during the last volume. D. W. Hull's Corresponding department, has also been removed and he enters the arena as an assistant editor. Last though not least, the other half of ourself, Evira L. Hall, who bears the burden and heat of the office work of the Crucible has entered the editorial corps. That old proverb, "Honor to whom honor is due," we cannot forget, and remembering it we could do nothing less than make the changes we have.

Any one wishing to know the particular editor that writes a particular article will find out by looking at its close as the initials of the writer will be put at the close of every important article. Olla Podrida is a dish in which all the editors will dip in common without being personally known. As the meaning of the word is, melange, we will make it such in more senses than one.

Hoping that our patrons will continue to cooperate with us, we introduce to them number one of volume two of the Crucible. M. H.

A. B. Whiting.

It is with great pleasure that we give place to the following resolutions:

WHEREAS, The physical body of A. B. Whiting has yielded to the ravages of disease, and the beautiful soul that once animated it has, taken its flight to a purer clime and a higher life; be it, therefore,

Resolved, That this Spiritualist society have always entertained the highest regard for his talent, and appreciations of his labor, and realize that in his transition the cause of Spiritualism has sustained an irreparable loss.

Resolved, That the spiritual society of Penn Haven do hereby tender to his bereaved mother and sister, an expression of our sympathy and heartfelt regret.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to his mother and sister, and that the spiritual press be requested to publish the same.

Spiritualism in St. Joseph, Mo.

BROTHER JONES:—A few intelligent and zealous Spiritualists in this city deeming an organization necessary for the good of our cause and that of humanity, issued and circulated the following:

DECLARATION.

We, the undersigned, citizens of St. Joseph, do hereby form ourselves into a Society, to be known as PROGRESSIVE SPIRITUALISTS for mutual benefit and the dissemination of truth, and agree to be governed by such Constitution and By-Laws as may be adopted by a majority of its members, and to pay, on the first Monday of every month, the sum set opposite our names, towards defraying its expenses.

Individuals may become members of this Society who are seeking after truth, with a desire to elevate and perfect their natures, and to promote their present and future happiness.

All persons becoming members of this Society will be required to live a good, moral, temperate, truthful, and virtuous life, and to do unto others as they would be done by—otherwise they may be expelled by a vote of two-thirds of its members present at any regular meeting. A member may withdraw at any time by notifying the secretary to that effect.

After a sufficient number of names were obtained, and the requisite amount of funds subscribed to insure its permanent success, they organized by electing the following officers, viz: John C. Binder, President; O. F. Smith, Vice President; John B. Harder, Recording Sec'y; Dr. Daniel White; Corresponding Sec'y, and George Seifert, Treas.

Regular meetings will be held every Sunday, at their Hall.

Our Society has opened under the most favorable auspices. Our worthy president proposes to donate a Melodeon, and the necessary number of "Spiritual Harps" to establish a good choir. The Spiritualists of St. Joseph, are composed of men and women whose moral character are above reproach, and having tested the truths contained in our beautiful philosophy, they desire to impart them to others.

Truly thine,

DANIEL WHITE, M. D.

[Reported expressly for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, by Henry T. Child, M. D.]

Address by Mrs. Sophronia E. Warner:

THE CHILDREN'S LYCEUM AND ITS WORK.

MRS. President and friends: The subject I have chosen for our consideration at this hour,—the Children's Lyceum and its work, is fraught with deep interest. Our friends who are interested in building up the various religious denominations of the land, see if they would have their children unfold in harmony with their ideas of right, that their Sunday school must not only be kept alive, but be imbued with a healthy growth. In this they act with a keen discernment of what constitutes their strength and safety as religious organizations. How much more should we, who believe that true religion is manly and womanly growth, realize the importance of this idea. It is evident that if we are to have healthy men and women,—healthy in body, mind and spirit,—we must create a right education for our children. If children are left in ignorance of the laws that govern them, they will from necessity trespass on those laws. True education is salvation. As Spiritualists, we take the ground that salvation cannot come through belief in the atonement of Jesus. We must work out our salvation. We must grow; but this we cannot do without we have the means of growth. Humanity in one sense may be called the tree of life. So far as this state of existence is concerned, men of us are but dried trees. But if we have left the germs from which new buds are to expand and blossom into existence, they must be fed with all the elements necessary to perfect them if we expect from them health and beauty.

Our children are to become the fathers and mothers, the law makers, and business men and women of the future. Their sentiments will be noble, temperate, and humanitarian—breathing justice, purity, and truest freedom; or they will be the reverse—carrying devastation, sorrow and death in their train.

The Children's Progressive Lyceum, in harmony with home education, must be the schooler of our darlings. To make it truly and efficiently so, work is before us. Our first business, as parents, conductors, officers and leaders of groups, is to acquire as far as we may, a knowledge of the laws which control our bodies; for we cannot have healthy minds without healthy bodies—the body being the medium through which the mind unfolds. Having this knowledge, we can impart it to our children. We should have the means of exploiting the physical structure, and what is needed to secure for it a harmonious growth. We find that ...ity unfolded through proper ex-

We therefore regard it as highly ... the Lyceum should establish the best system of gymnastic exercises, not to be taught merely for a few brief minutes each Sunday in the Lyceum Hall, but to be practiced profitably each day by every member who can obtain the time to do so. The system must be such as to give variety of movements, so that the eye may be pleased and strength given. Now there can be no grace of movements which cannot be made with the free use of every muscle and fibre of the body; and certainly we can not be rounded into symmetry and strength, unless there is perfect freedom in every motion. We must secure such instructors in this branch of our Lyceum as understand, and feel the importance of the work. As it is now carried on in all the Lyceums I have attended, there is a lack of interest manifested by the larger number of our girls and women, for the simple reason that as they are dressed they can derive no benefit from the exercises. Their dresses are too long on the shoulders, and too tight about the waist to permit any freedom or grace of motion. To such the ex rcises are practically a farce. They are ignorant of the reason why it is so; and they are not conscious that their is any greater freedom of breath and motion, for the fashionable practice of compressing their waists commenced by their mothers at too early a period for them to remember. I am aware that this is a hackneyed subject; but it is of such importance that it will bear discussion not only every day, but every hour of the day, until our mothers and sisters are thoroughly informed in this respect. No language can express the amount of misery and immorality growing out of the indecent practice of tight lacing. It is a part of our work to impress this truth on the minds of our members, and through them reach humanity at large. I know I am treading on dangerous ground if my object was to obtain praise; but a higher motive moves me than to seek applause at the expense of truth.

We have declared that true education is salvation, and that our Lyceums must be the educators. Our young girls must be the mothers of the succeeding generations. Shall they be prepared to give to the world healthy children in mind and body? or shall they, following the example of the past, bring forth subjects for drunkenness, insanity and the hangman's rope? Subjects who revel in the cesspools of crime, where all honor and purity are lost.

The office of breathing—of filling the lungs with pure air—purifies the blood, and brings health and happiness, and our children rise up and call us blessed, and we are blessed in them. But children born of mothers who were enslaved beneath cords and false supports, cannot be healthy in organization. Their blood is necessarily impure. Poor mothers, how they need the world's love and pity! They seek their happiness and gratify their propensities, as they come on the active scenes of life in artificial stimulants, and thus go down to misery and death.

My friends, we must inculcate temperance in its highest sense in our Lyceums. We must strike at the cause that produces

"The waste, the woe, the misery and the tears
That thick with terror all the rolling years."

Make all the laws we will—they may be good as far as they go. While the demand exists for alcoholic drinks, it will be had in spite of law, and until we can educate women above the practice of abusing their bodies, and men above the demand for alcoholic drinks, and the disgusting and equally pernicious habit of using tobacco in every form, we shall have crime, misery and degradation in the future as in the past and present.

Our children must have it proved to them that pure air, proper exercise, plain nutritious food, and nature's pure drinks, will promote health, happiness, and purity of character; and that the opposite of these will produce disease, misery, and all impurity of life.

With proper instruction, how much greater will be our work! The system of growth is different from that of stuffing the mind needless of its demands. Let us freely give time and money that we may make the study of physiology delightfully interesting. Let us bring to our aid the means of scientific proof in regard to the human structure, and what is needed to support it in health and beauty. Without this, all our preaching falls to the ground; for let me repeat it, without healthy bodies, we cannot have healthy minds or good religion. The person diseased in body cannot be the wise and gentle husband or wife, brother or sister, parent or child, that the same person could be in perfect health. We all understand, of course, that whenever we exercise any portion of the physical frame, more blood is carried to the part exercised; and if not overtaxed, that part becomes like the blacksmith's arm, developed and strong with use, while the young man who uses his muscular system but little, and his brain a great deal as a general rule, will live out but half his natural life. So he who alone cultivates the body and pays no attention to his mentality, will become dwarfed in intellect.

It is important then that officers and leaders of Lyceums, should aim to understand the natures and peculiar characteristics of their pupils. We must no longer do as we are now doing, and as the promoters of other systems before us have done: stimulate to greater mental activity those whose brains are already too active for their bodies. We must hold them back, while we urge on the bilious and lymphatic temperments to greater diligence. If we do not, our bright ones will die early, or live poor, debilitated unhappy beings, and our dull ones will fall far short of what they might have become under our fostering care.

With proper instruction for both classes, we shall unfold a beautiful and healthy variety of ability. We must not urge little ones of four, five and six years of age to commit poems or long articles of prose to recite, because they can not do it without injury to themselves; and we also discourage those of slower intellect by so doing. It is in this way our Lyceums die.

Every member, old and young, should be required to take part in all the movements of the Lyceum, for in this way we give the most variety, and we cannot die. Working with and for each other, we grow in beauty and symmetry, and present a scene not unlike the worlds of stars with which the Father of all Life hath adorned his footstool. Each one is a flower perfect in itself, and differing from all the rest; and yet we feel that all this variety of shapes and color, and fragrance, speaks more of grandeur, strength and beauty, and the boundless capacity of the All Father, than one simple flower alone, however beautiful it may be.

As we want cultivation in variety of talent, so we must have a variety of exercise, and not the same round of movements every session. To Mr. Davis, the founder of our system, we owe a debt of gratitude. We must love him for his help, and while we retain the central ideas he has given us, we ought not, nor can we suppose he would desire us, to confine ourselves exclusively to his Manual, or any other; but use all that we can make serve us, and adapt our exercises to individual cases. Brother Davis' brain is too large, his soul too generous to desire us to confine ourselves to his book just as Sunday schools have been confined to class books. His design is to aid in spiritual growth; and if we would grow, we must use all things as aids, not as authorities.

We must have interesting reading matter for our children.

No family connected with a Lyceum can afford to do without the Lyceum Banner. Instructive, interesting books, free from cant and creed, must be with us. And a very important thing is not to hold our sessions too long. Our exercises should be short and spicy. Our officers and leaders must be united, and lovingly supported by the members. Those who have charge of children must love them. We must speak to them in love, or no matter how wise we are, we cannot reach them. Societies and Lyceums should work for one interest. Such speakers alone should be engaged as will work with us, and the Societies should be just to them. No speaker can be just to himself, lecture twice and work in the Lyceum all in the same day. Where there are Lyceums, one lecture only should be given to the people or society on the day of its meeting, and an address of any fifteen or twenty minutes to the children. I would limit it to ten minutes rather than exceed twenty. No warm discussion should be permitted before the Lyceum, or in presence of the children. Where differences of opinion arise among officers and members, they should be presented in a style kindly suggestive, and not in the form of disputa such as apt to be elicited in regular debate. It is to be supposed that each one has the good of the cause at heart, and seeks no personal aggrandizement; and all remarks intended for the benefit of the whole, should be couched in such language the least child present can understand. The exercise of each separate group of course, will be conducted in harmony with the necessity of its members.

We cannot make the Lyceum a success in one week or one year. But if we work with loving, self-sacrificing hearts, through heat and cold, sunshine and storm, letting nothing divide us, we shall see our garden, which now looks all too barren, blossom with beauty and all that brings spiritual light and love. Our darlings of to-day shall become the noble men and women of the future.

On our faithfulness in this work depends our growth into healthy Spiritualists. We have no time to build up. We have humanitarian work to be done. Let us then study ourselves, and know the difference between perverted demands and natural ones. Let us not forget that we are to prove scientifically what kind of food best supports life. We surely know that blood, bone, muscle and tissue are made from the food we eat. It we sin, we must suffer the penalty. There is no escape. "Facts are stubborn things, and must be met." Only through obedience to the laws of our being can happiness be born. In view of all this, shall we be indifferent to the Lyceum work? Shall we not rather endeavor to convince every half dozen or more Spiritualists, who can be gathered together in one neighborhood, of the necessity of planting a Progressive Lyceum in their midst? Shall we as fathers and mothers, attend meetings at our halls to hear spiritual truths, while our children are in the streets, or being falsely and wickedly educated in orthodox Sunday schools? Shall we give money for seats in Christian churches while we let our Lyceums die for want of support? Good men and women of earth, and loved ones gone to the Better Land, are waiting to know whether we will do the great work of helping our children to a harmonious growth in manly and womanly graces, or whether we will write our own doom, and see our work given to another people.

I pray you come to the rescue. Make the Lyceum meet every demand of education. Aid in its steady growth, until we can have art and science taught our children until they shall have such a practical knowledge of themselves, that they will not stumble in darkness as have their fathers and mothers.

Oh, noble work to be done! How my heart throbs with conscious interest for the clasping of hands, and the union of loving souls, who will cast aside antagonism, and in solid masses move on, on, until we shall stand on the other shore, feeling that we knew our work and did it well.

Do this and no death itself will ever be sounded over a Lyceum. Every Sunday must find leaders, officers, members at their posts. And at stated periods, officers and leaders will hold meetings for consultation, for in the exchange of thoughts and friendly counsels we grow.

In conclusion, I ask that all here present, will pledge themselves anew to this important work.

WEDNESDAY—AFTERNOON SESSION.

Song by the choir.

MRS. WOODHULL'S ADDRESS.

I scarcely know how it has come about that I am on this rostrum, in the midst of a Spiritualistic convention. I have been a Spiritualist and a recipient of heavenly favors ever since I can remember, but for reasons never explained, I have not been known to Spiritualists, nor they to me. In my humble way I have been an earnest advocate of the principles of the spiritual philosophy, while to me its truths are quite as real as are the facts of material existence; and all my hopes for the future of humanity are founded upon the inauguration of a complete unity of purpose between the two spheres in all things upon which the good of humanity depends. I thank this convention for its hand of fellowship when so many others are set against me. If I have faults and errors, they have come from a misunderstanding of Him to whom I owe all that I am and who in my childhood taught me of the angels, in my youth smoothed the stony paths I trod and in maturer years instilled in my heart a love for all humanity, and to be whose servant is still all my ambition.

I propose to speak briefly of children—a subject which, though comparatively ignored, is to me one of the most important. I believe that Spiritualists have an interest in all kinds of reform, and therefore must have in this, which lies at the basis of all others, since a perfect humanity must come of perfect children.

We have often wondered that, among all the medical authorities, there have not been more who devoted some part of their professional writings to the sole natal care and treatment of children. No more important addition could be made to our system of social economy, nor to our pathological literature, than a strict analysis of foetal life for popular circulation. While so much has been said and written regarding children's care and treatment after birth, that part of their life previously has been entirely ignored. It would be just as proper to ignore their life after birth until some still future period, say three, five or seven years of age, as to do so before birth.

Today a good foundation for a good life, it is required that the proper care should be bestowed upon it from its very point of beginning. The tiller of the soil exercises special care and his best wisdom in the preparation for the future harvest. He knows, from oft repeated experience, how important it is to have the very best seed, of the very best variety. He knows that seed thus selected, planted side by side with unselected seed, and receiving no more care, will yield not only larger harvests but also that they will be of choicer quality.

Having the best seed possible, his next step is to have the ground properly prepared, into which at just the proper season, he deposits it. All these preparatory measures are a part of the process by which our fruits, grains, and vegetables have been brought to their present state of perfection. Everybody knows that fruits and vegetables which grow wild and are poisonous, are capable of being brought by cultivation to be delicious articles of diet. Everybody knows that by study and care our most celebrated breeds of horses and other stocks of domesticated animals have been obtained. Everybody knows that deep scientific research is constantly being made in almost every department of production, and that those engaged in the respective departments eagerly apply every new fact which science makes clear. It is an admitted fact that the future character of what is to be produced, can be very nearly, if not absolutely, determined by those who have charge of the process. Even the color which the herdsman desires for his cattle can be obtained; and what is true regarding color is just as true regarding all other indices of individuality.

Notwithstanding all these accepted facts which are coming to be the rules and guides of people, when we approach the subject of making the same rules and guides so general in their application as to include children, the world stands aghast and with one united effort, frowns it down.

Nobody denies the importance of the subject, but those who speak at all argue that it is one of those things which we are not prepared to meet. Not prepared to meet! And the whole Christian world has been preaching regeneration these eighteen hundred years! which they tell us is the one thing necessary. All the importance claimed for regeneration we willingly admit; all badly produced persons require regeneration; but as it is better the mole-hill may be dug to detour. If regeneration is an important matter, generation is still more so. It is to the consideration of this fact, as demonstrated and practiced in all departments of nature below, that the human must come and acknowledge itself a proper subject of. Just so far as science can demonstrate and humanity will put its demonstrations to practice, just so far can the necessity for regeneration be done away.

It is too true that the courage to face this question is generally wanting and when it is attempted, all society pretends to be outraged. Are human beings, then, to be always considered of so much less importance than the things they make subservient, that they should forever be left to come into this world's existence as individuals at random? We know the obloquy that has fallen upon all who have ever attempted to hold the mirror so that society would be obliged to contemplate itself; but, notwithstanding all this, we feel there is not a more noble object. We have considered all the bearings of this matter, and have determined to stand by the flag we have thrown to the world—"Children their Rights, Privileges, and Relations," and we shall maintain it argumentatively, if possible; defiantly, if need be, against all opposition, let it come from whence it may, or let its character be what it may. Argument we know we shall not have to encounter. Scientific hindrances we know we shall not find in our path. Common sense we know will offer no ground of rejection. We shall, however, encounter heavy-headed bigotry, blind intolerance and fossilized authority—and we are prepared.

It is held down as an undeniable proposition, that the human race can never even approximate to perfection until all the means of which men make use to produce perfect things are also made use of in their own production. Let those who decry the proposition turn to their so much-revered Bible and read: "Ye cannot gather figs of thorns nor grapes from thistles"—and learn wisdom therefrom. It must be remembered how great an "Infidel" was he who first demonstrated Arterial and Venous Circulation, which has come to be of such importance in diagnosing diseases. It is generally true that those truths which result in the greatest benefit to humanity, meet with the most blind and insane opposition in their first struggles for recognition. If this subject of children to be judged by this rule, it is to develop into a question of importance than any which has yet occupied the human mind.

But it is said, How can this be done? It cannot be done immediately to the fullest extent, but the recognition of its importance can be forced upon humanity, and the practice of its evident deductions can be attained by degrees. Once let it become divested of this awful idea of "in propriety," and humanity will begin to practice its teachings. It is only required that reason be exalted to its proper place and influence, and analogies, with which nature abounds, will become the great teachers.

The difficulty with which we shall be met at every step is, that it is nearly impossible to make people real in their lives before they are far any other or higher purpose than for each of them to acquire for him or herself the greatest amount of personal gratification. They cannot yet sufficiently realize that each individual is made one of the means by which the whole of humanity is advanced. They cannot yet be brought to reduce to practice what all admit, that hope of the greatest man of the world is he who does the most for humanity; nor have they more than an undefined belief that in doing the most for humanity, they do most for themselves. Yet this has been the logic of the doctrine of Christianity nearly two thousand years.

The teachings of Christianity are well enough, they have been taught perfectly. But we have now arrived at that age of the world which demands adequate results as proofs of the validity of its most positions. The Apostles taught that "error in signs" should follow those who believed. Do these signs exist within the heart of the professed representatives of true Christianity? By their fruits shall ye know them. We do know them by their fruits, which are not to perfect as to warrant the conclusion that humanity has passed from being "professors" into being "possessors."

Human life may be compared to a military campaign, in which no amount of valiancy and good generalship can overcome the defects of an imperfect organization of the "body" with which it is to be made. We may as consistently expect a badly organized army to make a good military campaign as to expect a badly organized child to make a good social campaign. To this the very beginning of organization should all reformers turn who expect to produce any beneficial results, which shall be ultimate and lasting, and which shall mark the perfecting process of humanity.

Women by nature, are appointed to the holy mission of motherhood, and by this mission, are directly charged with the care of the embryotic life, upon which so much of future good or ill depends. It is during this brief period that the initials of character are stamped upon the receptive, incipient mentality, which, expanding first into childhood and on to manhood or womanhood reveals the true secrets of its nature.

The babes of children, then, as individuals, begin while yet they are in fœtal life. Children do not come into existence by any will or consent of their own. With their origin they have nothing to do, but in after life they become liable for action which perhaps was predetermined long prior to their assuming personal responsibility. In youth, children are virtually the dependents of their parents, subject to their government, which may be either wise or mischievous, and is apt to be the latter as the former. But, having arrived at the proper age, they step into the world upon an equality with others previously there. At this time they are the result of the care which has been bestowed upon them from the time of conception, and whether they are to be of power to the world, or to be useful members of society, or whether they go into it to prove a constant annoyance and curse, seems to be a matter which cannot be made into such personal responsibility as to make it a subject of their own determining. At this period they find themselves possessed of a body and a partially developed mind, in the union of which a harmonious disposition and character may have resulted. Respectively, they are possessed of all shades of disposition and character, from the angelic down to the most demoniacal; but all these are held accountable to the same law; are expected to govern themselves by the same form ula of associative justice, and are compelled by the power of public opinion to subscribe to the same general customs.

All people are obliged to meet the world with the characteristics with which they have been clothed, and which they had no chance in selecting. When all things which go to make up society are analyzed and formulated, it comes out that society holds its individual members responsible for deeds of which it is itself indirectly the cause, and therefore responsible for.

It is a scientifically demonstrated fact that the mind of every individual member of society is the result of a continued series of impressions, which are continually being received by their senses, and transmitted to and taken up by consciousness, which becomes the individuality of the person. If any one doubt this, let him listen to what Prof. J. W Draper, President of the New York Medical University College, says upon this subject:

"There are successive phases * * * in the early action of the mind. As soon as the senses are in working order * * * a process for collecting facts is commenced. These are the first of the most homely kind, but the sphere from which they are gathered is extended by degrees. We may, therefore, consider that this collecting of facts is the earliest indication of the action of the brain, and it is an operation which, with more or less activity, continues through life * * * * Soon a second characteristic appears—the learning of the relationship of the facts thus acquired to one another. This stage has been sometimes spoken of as the dawn of the reasoning faculty. A third characteristic of almost contemporaneous appearance may be remarked—it is the putting to use facts that have been acquired and the relationships that have been determined. Now this triple natural process * * * * must be the basis of any right system of instruction." It appears, then, that constant and constant intercourse with external manifestations is not only necessary for the production of thought and its collaterals, but that to retain the consciousness which makes thought possible such manifestations must be continuously impressed upon the individual. This seems to be conclusive that mind is the result of the experience of the manifestations of power.

Without these premises children would grow up simply idiotic. The "Professor" says, emphatically, that "acquisition of this process must be the basis of any right system of instruction position can be profoundly [illegible] in surrounding them [illegible] and facts as will present upon them those effects which will tend to develop them toward our highest idea of perfect men and women.

The chief difficulty about these things is that their direction has been assumed by the professors of religion rather than by scientists. Science is eminently progressive; religion is as eminently conservative. Science, in its analysis of the facts of the age, comes in direct conflict with the theories of religious sects. Happily, these things are now undergoing changes, and they who once taught that the world was created out of nothing in six days and nights, of twenty-four hours each, have given way to the demonstrations of geology, and are forced to admit that their previous belief was founded on an allegory.

The common practice of the world, in all things which it desires to modify or remedy, is to begin at the extreme, where the effects are found, and from them to work backward toward the beginning. The whole course of the world regarding crime has been to punish rather than to prevent it; to work with the effects of education. What men or women are at the time they become recognized as sinners, society makes them. They are its production, as much as the apple is the production of the tree. If the apple is a bad apple, it is not its fault; that lies in the tree. If men and women are bad men and women when they arrive at legal age, it is not their fault, but it is the fault of society in which they are born, raised and educated.

It is scientifically true that the life which develops into the individual life never begins. That is to say, there is no time in which it can be said life begins where there was no life. The structural unit of nucleated protoplasm, which forms the center around which aggregation proceeds, contains a pulsating life before it takes up this process. The character of the nerve stimulus of which this is composed and which sustains this evidence of life, must depend upon the source from which it proceeds. In other words, and plainly, the condition of the parents at the time of the conception is a matter of prime importance, since the life principle with which the new organism is to begin its growth should be of the highest order.

Cases of partial and total idiocy have been traced to the beastly inebriation of the parents at and previous to conception. On the other extreme, some of the brightest intellects and the most noble and loveable characters the world ever produced, owed their condition to the peculiarly happy circumstances under which they began life, much of the after portion of the growing process of which having been under favorable circumstances. May not mothers trace the irritable and nervously disagreeable condition of their children to their own condition at this time.

We are aware that these subjects are almost unanimously ignored by society; also, that society pretends to blush at the mention of them; and well it may blush, for the abortions of nature which it is continually turning upon the world to be its pests, its devils, its damnations and their own worst enemies, are sufficiently hideous to make all humanity blush with well-founded shame.

But the time must come wherein they will not only be discussed, but when a full knowledge of what pertains to conception, fœtal life, birth and growth to full manhood and womanhood will be an important part of every child's education.

Virtue nor modesty does not consist in the avoidance, the ignoring or ignorance of these things, but true virtue, true modesty and true general worth consist, in part, at least, of a complete knowledge and practice of them. It is full time that we have done with the sham modesty and artificial virtue with which humanity has been cursed.

It is required that we begin at the very root of the matter, and that lies in the condition of persons about to become parents. And just to this point is where the woman question leads. It is the important question of the age, and it will rise to be thus acknowledged. All present humanity demands of the present its right to the best life which it is possible to have under the best arrangement of present circumstances which can be formulated. And there are those who will not permit that their rights be much longer ignored. There will be "John the Baptists" preaching in the wilderness to prepare the way, and humanity must and will heed them. Such is the prophecy of the present; and the present will do well to listen to its teachings.

The New York Tribune asserts that the cause of half the vice among us is the ignorance of parents of the fact that certain nervous and cerebral diseases transmitted from them tend to make of their children from their birth criminals or drunkards, and that only incessant and skillful care can avert the danger. The editor then goes on to philosophize in this way:

"A man may drink moderately but steadily all his life, with no apparent harm to himself, but his daughters become nervous wrecks, his sons epileptics, libertines, or incurable drunkards, their hereditary tendency to crime having its pathology and natural laws, precisely as scrofula, consumption, or any other purely physical disease. These are stale truths to medical men, but the majority of parents, even those of average intelligence, are either ignorant or wickedly reckless of them. There would be a chance of ridding our jails and almshouses of half their tenants when our people are taught to treat drunkenness as a disease of the stomach and blood as well as of the soul, to meet it with common sense and a physician, as well as with threats of eternal damnation, and to remove gin-shops and gin-sellers for the same reason that they would stagnant ponds or uncleansed sewers. Another fatal mistake is pointed out in the training of children on the system of cramming, hot-house forcing of their brains, indecent parity by the unhealthy, feverish ambition and struggle that mark every phase of our society, and parity for the short time allowed for education. The simplest physical laws that regulate the use and abuse of the brain are utterly disregarded by educated parents. To gratify a mother's silly vanity during a boy's school days, many a man is made conceited and self-useless. If the boy show any sign of unusual ambition or power, instead of regarding it as a symptom of an unhealthy condition of the blood vessels or other cerebral disease, and treating it accordingly, it is accepted as an evidence of genius, and the inflamed brain is taxed to the uttermost, until it gives way exhausted."

When a paper, which so religiously ostracizes so much which is involved in the principles of general reform, as the Tribune does, comes so near to the "root of the matter," it may be seriously considered whether the time has not arrived in which to speak directly to the point.

There seem to be two duties devolved: first, and mainly, to prevent the union of persons addicted to bad practices; second, to endeavor to reform those who are already united.

A positive assertion is here made. No two persons have the right to produce a human life and irremediably entail upon physical and mental bad [illegible] in the nearest [illegible] of drunkard, or the sins of his or her parents. It is the most superficial nonsense and the purest malice to curse the bad fruit which grows in your orchard because you do not take care of the tree; but it is no more so than it is to curse and punish children for the crime of their parents.

Marriage or the union of the sexes is a natural condition of the human race, and whatever relations they may sustain to the children they produce, these which society and a whole physique take to them are broader and more comprehensive. The parents are but parts of society, and their children are nothing less, so that while they, by present social systems, are for a long time left to the special control and guardianship of their parents, it can be considered only as in trust for society.

The relations which should be considered as the foundation of society are those which exist between society and marriage in its special function of reproduction, which thus far has been utterly ignored. When two are about to form a marriage union, does society in its legitimate functions of promoting and protecting the public welfare ever stop to ask what the results of the union are likely to be? Instead of this question entering into the consideration, the only one that has been thought of is: How shall these two be compelled to live out the remainder of their natural lives together, utterly regardless of the higher thought of children.

It is a well established fact among the medical profession that nearly all the consumption which hurries on many victims through life has its source in hereditary syphilitic taint, which, for delicacy, has been christened scrofula. Now what business or right has a man or woman, who knows that his or her system is loaded with this diseased poison, to become the propagator of the species? Ten cases in every time of all other diseases and damnations which can be transmitted, and not more of those which pertain to the purely physical than of those which relate to the mental and the moral. When the world shall begin to act upon this deduction, it will have commenced a course of advancement which will never be intermixed with retreats.

Education in matters which refer to these vital points should be one of the first steps to be taken by society. They have been foolishly and criminally ignored upon the false premises that to instruct children in them would be to lead them into unfortunate conditions, whereas the very reverse is the truth. If there are dangers to be avoided, the very best way to prepare children to avoid them is to give them a perfect understanding of what they are. In knowledge there is always safety. In ignorance there is always danger.

Let these truths be adopted in the education of children, regarding their duties as the future parents of society, and one-half the ills with which society is inflicted would disappear.

If our houses of prostitution were searched and their inmates questioned, none would be found whose mothers had the good sense to teach them the objects and functions of their sexual systems. It is the ignorance of these things which fills these blotches upon the fair face of humanity.

There is a law common to nature by which these things that are best adapted to each other are brought and held together. There is a chemistry of the social, intellectual and moral sentiments as well as of the material elements. Education should include a perfect knowledge of this chemistry, so that compatibles may be apparent at once to all people of both sexes. Open the fountains of knowledge, so that all may drink of the waters of a true life.

Children, by the little things they so readily gather about the difference of sex, are made curious to find to the extent the means of satisfying that curiosity is diffused, and they pursue these means by stealth whenever and wherever possible. This results in producing a morbid condition of the mind about it, and encourages all kinds of secret vices, which are sapping the very life and beauty of the coming generation. No one can doubt this who will give it the attention it merits, to be one of the saying evils of present systems of education. If instructions were begun in these matters at or about the age when curiosity is developed, and it is made a matter of course, is it not plain that it would produce artificial results?

We are aware that "conservatives" will decry this plain way of treating this subject, and make use of the usual method of manifesting their condemnation; nevertheless, the proposition to us is a simple one, over which we have spent many weary hours. A secret attracts everybody's attention. When it is a secret no longer it ceases to attract attention, and becomes reduced to its legitimate and natural uses. We assert that one half the sense results would follow were the relations of children in sexual matters; knowledge would succeed curiosity, and healthy action of the mind.

We now approach a part of the subject which is of supreme moment, and that is the care which embryotic life demands. During this period, every influence to which the mother is subjected, be it ill or good, produces its effect upon the embryo. Whoever is an adept in these matters can go through society and from each individual tell what circumstances his or her mother was surrounded by during her pregnancy. Mothers of humanity! yours is a fearful duty and one which should in its importance lift you entirely above the customs of society, its frivolities, superficialities and deformities, and make you realise that to you is committed the divine work of perfecting humanity.

Under our systems the interests of children are utterly ignored. No matter how ill-mated people may be, children will result. It will be their misfortune to be born where actual hate exists, and not find children. What can be expected of children generated, born and raised under such influences? There are numerous instances constantly being made public where mothers are even brutally treated during pregnancy, and oftentimes because they are pregnant.

Just the life the mother leads will she prepare her child to lead. Just what the mother desires to make her child she can mould and fashion it to be. What a condemnation these considerations are upon the practices of fashionable society. How utterly worthless are the lives of so many mothers, and how devoid of purpose. Just so are their children. In the insane desire for dress and display, which characterizes so many women, lies the base of life for their children. The cold heartlessness of the woman of fashion contains the germ of destruction for her daughter and the seeds of vice for her son. No warm-hearted, generous-souled children can spring from such soil.

Abortion is also a practice which spreads damnation world-wide. Not so much, perhaps, in those cases where it is accomplished, but in those much more numerous cases where it is desired and attempted, but not reached. When a woman becomes conscious that she is pregnant, and a desire comes up in her heart to shirk the duties it involves, that moment the fœtal life is the unloved, the unwished child. Is it to be wondered at that there are so many undutiful children—so many who instinctively feel that they are "accidents" rather than the beautiful necessities of love?

What true mother's heart but bounds with pride and joy when she sees the spontaneous results of her constructive work? Why should she not also feel happiness when she realizes that she is performing that constructive process? Is it to be wondered at that so many children are left to grow up like Topsies in themselves and so foolishly difficient that it follows them through life, when we consider the conduct of women during pregnancy? It should be the pride of every woman to be the willing the next via, the contented mother, and if she be so under the guidance of the knowledge we deem [illegible] to regret. All [illegible] ner of [illegible] by every [illegible] to wisely and perfectly mould and fashion the life which they shall give to the world.

But we must pass from ante-natal life to that which has so generally been considered the beginning of it, and here a startling question will develope itself for us to be approached in the most reverential manner. How little natural attention or acquired knowledge there is in regarding the early care of children, their immense death rate clearly shows. It seems one of the most sorrowful things of life to see the merest babes drop off by thousands, for the reason that mothers do not know how to rear them.

If wives will become mothers without the knowledge requisite to fit them to perform their duties to their children then they should themselves be put under the care of some competent authority, so that the life they have been instrumental in organizing may not be uselessly thrown away. We are arguing, pleading, urging the rights of children; these rights which shall make every child, male and female, honorable and useful members of society.

Whether in acquiring this right all old forms, all present customs, all supposed interests are found to be standing in the way, matters not, the question is: What is for the best interests of children, not merely as children, but principally as the basis of future society? Scarcely any of the practices of education, of family duties or of society's rights in regard to children are worthy of anything but the severest condemnation. They do not have their inherent rights at all in view. They consult the affections to the exclusion of all reason and common sense. They forget that the human is more than an affectional being; that he has other than family duties to fulfill and that belongs to humanity, which is sought to be met by all present practices.

Let the father and mother of every family ask themselves: Are we fully capable of preparing our children that no other means could make them better citizens and better men and women? And how many could conscientiously give you an affirmative answer? The fact that children are born and grown to be citizens, and not to remain children of the parents simply, is ever-lasting.

We are aware that this, if intended for any considerable and comprehensive application, would be regarded as a startling assertion. Many true things when first announced startle the world which thought differently so long. For ourselves we make the distinct assertion that we are thoroughly convinced that fully one half the whole number of children now living, between the ages of six and fifteen, would have been in a superior condition—physically, mentally, and morally—to what they are, had they been early entrusted to the care of the proper kind of industrial institutions.

We hold it to be an absolute and fundamental right that every child male and female, has, that when they are received into society, as determining powers, they shall be possessed of the required capacity and experience to take care of themselves, and to perform what may be required of them. Those who are best prepared to fulfill the duties which can by any possibility devolve upon them as members of society, are the best citizens, and give unanswerable evidence of having been the recipients of the best means of growth and education.

To make the best citizens of children, then, is the object of education, and in whatever way the end be attained, that is the one which should be pursued, even if it be to the complete abrogation of the present supposed rights of parents to control them. It is better that parents shall not be able to look with pride upon their children grown into maturity, as youthful citizens by the assistance of the State, having been unable to make them thus themselves, than to commit the sentiments of the heart, by having them constantly under their care, and by so doing allow them to grow into maturity in form and grace, yet lacking the necessary elements to make them acceptable to, or to be desired by, society. One of these is the result of the existence of wisdom; of affection, guided by reason; the other that of selfishness in which the good of the child is made the subject of self-love, regardless of consequence. No reasonable person can question which of the two is the better for all concerned for children, for parents and for society.

The weight of our proposition, that society is itself responsible to children for the condition in which they are admitted to it as constituent members of itself, must be taken as important, so far as they are concerned up to the time they are not responsible. This being self-evident, is it not also self-evident that they can not, with any consideration of justice, be held to account for that which is the legitimate consequences of, and which is positively determined by, that condition?

We trust that the time is near when the rights and privileges of children will be duly accorded and guaranteed to them by society, and when their true relations to society will be scientifically analyzed and understood and properly enforced.

Then will the prophecies of all ages have reached consummation; then will commence the earthly reign of the King of kings and Lord of lords, as prophesied by all the holy prophets of the world; then old things shall pass away, and all things become new; then The Word shall sit upon the throne, and upon his incensured fountain of love, justice shall continually flow over all the earth, "as the waters cover the sea."

As vanish the heavy mists of the morning before the radiance of the rising sun, so will vanish the clouds that hang around the minds of men, and shut out the rising spiritual sun, for whose "star in the East" wise men are constantly watching; the sun that will rise higher and higher, and extend its rays wider and wider, until it shall enlighten the minds of all mankind, until the icebergs of ignorance, tradition, and superstition are dissolved which now float in the ocean of progress—society, with its cankered, festering heart; commerce robbed of its legitimate function; labor of its remuneration, and religion of its spirituality, education lacking wisdom, marriages forming disunions, and women without their rights.

All the false forms of the present must yield their sway to God's commands—"Let there be light." The laws of God are never changed—though old as creation, they are ever new—ever sufficient for all the vicissitudes of life; they never fail of wisdom, justice, and love; they are written all over the face of creation, in the bosom of the earth, and in the heart of man; they are uttered by the raging tempest that rocks the mighty ocean; in the terrible mutterings of the earthquake, in the fury of destructive battle, when hosts are buried on hosts in fratricidal strife; through all these the voice of God proclaims—"Let there be light," and there is light.

We also hear its whispers in the gentle zephyrs that stir the bursting buds, and in the blooming flowers that lift their heads to drink the falling dew; in the gushing fountain; we see it in the symbols of the babbling brook; in the mother's love for the new-born life; in the father's pride; in the outspoken joy of the maiden's soul, leaping to its first waves of conscious love; in the magnetic ties of human sympathy which bind all mankind in a common brotherhood, and in the dawning light of heaven brought to earth by the angelic hosts to usher in the reign of universal justice, peace and love.

Dr H B. Storer, of Boston, submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously carried.

Resolved That this Convention is honored by the participation in its deliberations of Mrs. Victoria C Woodhull, whose selection of the fundamental subject of reform, has been fully justified by her able statement of its importance; and that our thanks are hereby expressed to her for the comprehensiveness, plainness of speech, and true delicacy with which this eminently radical subject has been treated by her.

A. A. Wheelock on behalf of the Committee on Lyceums reported as follows:

WHEREAS, It must be apparent to Spiritualists and all friends of the Children's Progressive Lyceums, that this beautiful system of education, indispensable to the development of children into a full-grown manhood and womanhood of spiritual freedom, has not attained that permanency and efficiency the merits of the system and the hopes of its earnest friends would justify;

Your committee, in the brief time allotted them, has earnestly endeavored, in part at least, to analyze the numerous causes of failure to carry forward successfully Lyceums already organized, which varied and numerous causes, though they do hinder and retard the growth and efficiency of Lyceums, as well as preventing to a great extent the organization of new ones, still these causes belong to the local conditions of the different Lyceums, which may be termed the minor causes of failures, and having their origin in local surroundings, must find a remedy in the superior intelligence of those creating them; the wisdom of those who conducting the different Lyceums.

We do not deem it essential to enumerate here the minor causes of failure. We do think it most essential that this Convention earnestly consider the major and minor causes of these failures of Lyceums, which your Committee believe to be the unfortunate practice which Spiritualists have adopted, of making two local organizations, wherever they have attempted to do anything practically to advance the cause,—one known as a "Spiritualist Society," and the other as "The Children's Progressive Lyceum."

Besides the increase of labor, time, and money to sustain two organizations, the general experience thus far has been, that more or less of rivalry, jealousy, discord, and disharmony have been created, causing the final and practically speaking, the utter failure of the object of both.

We recognize but one purpose in all true reform,—the good of humanity,—and knowing that in unity only can there be found sufficient strength to realize success in organization, your Committee respectfully suggest that Spiritualist every where commence a radical "New Departure" in organization.

First—That all the objects involved in the practical work of Spiritualists, be concentrated in one organization for each locality.

Second—That organizations, local, State, Territorial, and National, shall be adjusted to harmonize with this idea.

Third—That all local organizations be known as "The Spiritualist's Progressive Lyceum," and that in all localities for local organizations, Spiritualists are earnestly requested to bring all their energies and means to the support of the Lyceum movement, and its legitimate outgrowth.

Fourth—That regarding the Lyceum system a holy ministration of the angels to humanity, it was not intended in principle or practice, to embody a system of instruction for one seventh of the time only, but that in its genius and scope, it is designed as the basis of a method of progressive education for all humanity, alike applicable by the necessity, to all days and all time.

Fifth—That we may realize something practical in the interest of education, Spiritualists are requested to rally to the Lyceums everywhere, and to so adjust their local and other organizations with the requirements of legal statutes, as to enable them to become the guardians or recipients of such bequests as may be left by generous, wealthy Spiritualists to support the cause.

Sixth—That regarding the continued education of young and old; the constant gaining of wisdom by all while remaining in the body, the great work Spiritualists have to do, we deem it of the first importance, that immediate measures should be taken to establish one or more advanced Lyceums or schools, where the speakers and teachers of Spiritualism may receive the highest culture, and all the benefits a complete scientific education can give.

Seventh—That considering the Lyceum system, when fully understood and intelligently and faithfully carried out, of sufficient breadth and scope to do all the practical part of Spiritualism within the broad, generous, just principles of that organization, we regard with great satisfaction the action of one of the Lyceums of Baltimore, in the institution of an annual Lyceum movement, "The Young People's Spiritual Association." The by-laws of which say:

"The Committee on Lyceums shall take measures for opening and sustaining new Lyceums, visit those already established, and endeavor to increase their number and efficiency."

The Report was discussed by A. A. Wheelock, Mrs Woodhull, Edward G. Granville, and Edward S Wheeler, who offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the formation of union local organizations of Spiritualists Societies and Lyceums among those in sympathy with their philosophy wherever any such may be, such societies to have for their objects the consideration of matters regarding the number and disposition of those connected; the equal spiritual, mental, and physical education of both sexes and all persons, and the union and fraternization of all State, National, and International Associations, for the general purpose of procuring an orderly freedom, and aiding the evolution of progress. In pursuance of this purpose, we would also recommend that our Board of Trustees take into consideration the gradual and healthy development of the work of this Association, as set forth in Article 2d of its Constitution, and put into action a system of questions and suggestions inviting answers from all persons interested in the issues involved. After that said Board shall call a General Meeting of this Association, make such recommendations for action by that meeting as in their judgment shall embody measures to the end desired.

After further remarks by Dr. Child, Freeman J. Gurney, Mrs Abby K. Cutler, Dr. Robt. T. Halleck, J. K Bailey, Dr. H. B Storer, Peter P. Good, Dr. L. K Coonley, and Wilson Miller, the matter was made the special order for Tuesday morning, 9 A. M.

LYCEUM EXHIBITION.

The exhibition of the children of the Progressive Lyceum was one of the finest miscellaneous entertainments ever given by the children in this city. The choral singing by the entire body of children was quite spirited, and seemed to be the result of careful training. The silver song by Master [illegible] a duet, with tro[illegible] by Misses. Gill and Young, were all very meritorious, and elicited the genial applause

Potassium—Its Discovery Appearance, and properties—Its Action on Fire, Decomposes the Compounds Containing Oxygen—Oxygen and Potassium Considered as Representatives of their Classes—Potash or Protoxyde of Potassium their First Compound, its General Importance and Uses—Fluoride Chloride Bromide and Iodide of Potassium Sodium, Lithium Calcium, Glucinium etc.—Potash as the Representative of Salts Embodying in its Compound Nature the Positive and Negative Elements of the Elements of which it is Composed—Repulsion and Affinity Depending upon Similar and Dissimilar Polarity's or Life Measures of Condition—General Rule may be proved by the Seeming Exceptions when properly Analyzed and Understood—Oxygen and Potassium and their Reciprocating Compounds—Chief Sources of Potassium in the Mineral Vegetable and Animal Kingdoms—The Vegetable and Animal Economy Elaborates of Potassium Superior to Chemical Reagents—Carbonates, Nitrates and Chlorates of Potash—Sulphur and its Compounds Returning Affinities from whence ever most Important Chemical Disideratums are Derived—Mathematics of Chemistry.

POTASSIUM sodium, barrium, strontium and calcium were discovered by Sir Humphrey Davy of England, in 1807, thirty-three years after the discovery of oxygen, from which the modern march of chemistry may be said to have begun.

These electro-positive elements (as already stated) were obtained by subjecting their salts, or salts containing them, to the affinite suspending supervision of a powerful galvanic current. Potassium, which is the most positive or highest electrical life-measure, comes on as the chief representative of the more positive alkaline earths and metals in the same ratio as oxygen leads the more electro-negative acids and oxyds. So strong and universal are the affinities of potassium for everything containing oxygen that it is never found in an uncombined state, and requires the utmost skill of the chemist to obtain it and preserve it in its purity, which, however, is usually done by dissolving the carbonate of potash with sulphur and at an exceedingly high temperature, after which it is kept in naptha oil, free from any approach of oxygen.

Potash as the first compound of the two polar extremes, may be said to bind the more extreme salts, such as the fluorides, chlorides, bromides, iodides, sulphates, selenates, tellurates, nitrates, and phosphates of potassium, all of which, as well as other salts of potassium too numerous to mention now, are of invaluable importance to the arts, sciences, and, in fact, almost every vital interest and pursuit of human life.

As already suggested, potassium decomposes many compounds containing oxygen at ordinary temperatures, and nearly all compounds containing oxygen at a high temperature, as well as under the affinity suspending supervision of a powerful galvanic current. So strong are the affinities of potassium, that if thrown upon water, which is composed of oxygen and hydrogen, it being 17 degrees more positive, or possessing that much more electrical strength than hydrogen, sleeps upon the oxygen with such avidity as to decompose the water and set the released hydrogen on fire.

Potash, which results from the polar extremes or measure of perfection or imperfection of electric condition, as already observed, stands at the head of the salts. It dilutes the most powerful acids, re-acts on litmus, changes acid red to alkaline blue, vegetable yellow to brown, and often decomposes vegetable and animal matter, converting ulcers, cleansing old sores, forming soap with oils and, in fact, answering, as chances serve, the most important demands of every-day life. Hence, since it is impracticable in an article of this kind to more than glance generally at the main points bearing on the great question, as to the true chemical source of motion in matter; suffice it to say, that all of the elementary combinations, with potassium are marked and important in their place.

While we remember that oxygen has no affinity for fluorine, its next-door neighbor,—must potassium has no affinity for its next-door neighbor sodium, and that the same rule applies in the polar or elementary sense, to all next-door neighbors, it should be equally remembered that any element, after advancing a few degrees from any polar standpoint, will silence advances in either direction toward the negative or positive pole, to reciprocate mutual affinities with its most inviting neighbor. Oxygen, for instance, has no affinity for fluorine, but has some for chlorine, more for bromine, more for iodine, and still more for sulphur, and so on, growing stronger and stronger, degree by degree, until it reaches the electro-positive, potassium. The same in turn may be said of potassium, as it jumps over its nearest neighbor, sodium, and advances, degree by degree, toward the electro-negative, oxygen. The same in ratio may be said of the nature and character of all elementary affinities depending on polar condition for their ever-changing motion in matter so called. The mineral source of potassium is the felspar of the rocks on the granite stratification, in which from two to three per cent. is found. No easy nor economical means has yet been observed by which to free this percentage of potassium from the silicic acid with which it is combined in felspar. Plants, however, in their electro magnetic affinity corresponding or life assimilating power, can and do through their roots go down into these rocks and earth-soils, decompose them, and bring the once alive potassium up, as if into a renewed, and perhaps a still more active life again.

Among the many important compounds of potassium is the carbonate of potassium, from which gunpowder, percussion caps, matches, etc., are manufactured.

Hoping the interested reader has become sufficiently familiar with the premises to follow our deductions with profit, we will now turn to a brief consideration of some of the allotter ranges of affinity from which we derive our greatest advantage, prominent among which are sulphur and its compounds. It will be remembered that sulphur is only removed six degrees from oxygen in the electro-negative direction, and consequently has a strong affinity for it, and may be more plain, if possible: sulphur being the first element far enough removed from oxygen to have a manifest affinity for it, must, by reason of a similarity of electrical life measure, occupy a similar, and hence a weak affinity for oxygen, and vice versa. When it is remembered that oxygen has seven times stronger affinity for every element beyond sulphur than sulphur has itself, we can readily see why sulphuric acid, composed as it is of four proportions of oxygen to one of sulphur, should so readily give up its oxygen to oxygen's more extreme affinities, and combine itself with the leavings of all oxygenous combinations, thus forming its wondrously curious, extensive and useful scope of inside combinations, or combinations inside of the polar extremes of oxygen and potassium.

Sulphur burns with a bright blue flame, is a non-conductor of electricity and poor conductor of heat. It is found in abundance in a free and combined state, in and near the localities of volcanoes and volcanic springs, as well as the mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms generally, and is otherwise too well known to require a more special description. Many of the sulphates constitute the leading articles of commerce. The physician, scientist, artisan, manufacturer, agriculturist, mineralogist would now be seriously incommoded without them.

Gypsum, plaster of Paris, or alabaster, so extensively used as a cement, as well as for moulding statuary and stone-work, and for fertilizing the soil, is found in rocks and caves in great abundance, and is but a sulphate of lime. The well-known glauber salt is a sulphate of soda. Epsom salts is a sulphate of magnesia. And the sulphate of aluminum with a mixture of potash constitutes the alum of commerce. Many of the medicines are sulphates, such as the sulphate of quinine, sulphate of morphia, and other sulphates of pharmacy too numerous to mention.

Fearing that too careless a confidence may be placed in the electrical range of the elementary polarities enumerated in our table, it must be remembered that chemistry is now as little understood, so revolutionary, progressive, and unsettled, as to preclude absolute precision; yet sufficient is known, and is plain to be observed, to prove the nature and character of the laws of force measuring, and operative in, matter so called.

As observers we may err, yet there is an unerring system of mathematics in chemistry regulating its affinities, elective affinities, adhesions, cohesions, and attractions of gravitation, as much as there is in the wondrous realms of astronomy. The selfsame forces are operative in each sphere of condition, from the humblest ranges of microscopic to the more immeasurable ranges of telescopic existence; and to observe, compare, analyze, and study these spheres and their governing laws, is to be truly profited by the researches of true science, and profit others in the profit thus derivable to ourselves.

We know by special analysis that water consists by weight of one proportion of hydrogen to eight of oxygen, and when combined in these proportions produces water and nothing else. We know potash by weight consists of 39 parts of potash to 8 of oxygen, and that they combining in these proportions will produce nothing but potash. We know common salt, or chloride of sodium consists by weight of 35 proportions of chlorine to 23 proportions of sodium, and that they combining in these proportions will form but the chloride of sodium.

These well-known, well signed, and well established facts are as fixed as figures, and suggest that it is our duty to search out the problem underlying them as the cause of the motion, thus definitely measuring the proportions in and through which their chemical affinities manifest themselves.

The rocks of the interior earth, the mountains and the valleys, the ever-varied soil beneath our feet, the wondrous kingdoms of organic and inorganic life, and all the grandly balanced relations, of "earth, air, fire and water," are all necessarily pervaded by the same ruling spirit of unity in diversity.

The elements of coal, drawn from the sun through the vegetable and animal life, give forth in the process of their combustion, the ratio of elements elaborated from the magnetism of electricity in motion, or the sunlight and heat of other years, nothing can escape the numerical forces of polar causation. Yet to learn its precise nature and character is the great deliberation that has thus far called forth a statement of these facts and suggestive observations, which each mind must compare, weigh, and judge for itself.

ILLINOIS.

Cambridge Convention.

[Reported for the Religio-Philosophical Journal.]

Pursuant to the call, the Convention met and was called to order at 2:30 P. M., September 9, 1871.

Dr. J. Allen was elected President, and C. H. Doty, Secretary.

After debate a Committee, consisting of C. H. Doty, E. S. Roberts, Isaac Paden, Mrs. Abbe Lyrd Palmer, and Mrs. Wm. Sackbouse, were appointed to report a plan of organization. They reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That we as Spiritualists and friends of progress, organize according to the Act of the Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved February 24 h, 1859.

After debate, the Resolution was adopted, and the Committee ordered to prepare a Constitution and By-Laws in accordance therewith, to report at a future meeting; but afterward it was reconsidered, and they were ordered to report the following day.

Mrs. Addie L. Ballou having been secured as speaker for the occasion, lectured in the evening, upon the subject, "Spiritualism, its claims, aims, etc."

SUNDAY—MORNING SESSION.

A love feast, or conference, was held at 9½ o'clock. It was participated in by many, with very happy effect.

Mrs. A. L. Ballou again lectured at 10½ o'clock, upon the subject of "Development, or Growth." The scientific and elocutionary beauties of this address were too good for description, and had a telling effect.

SUNDAY—AFTERNOON SESSION.

At 1½ o'clock P. M., the Convention again convened, when the Committee on Constitution and By-Laws made the following Report, which was adopted.

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.—Name.

Sec. 1. The Society shall be known as the Henry [illegible] Association, to be incorporated for the term of twenty years.

Sec. 2. The Officers of this Society shall consist of three Trustees, a President, a Vice-President, and a Secretary, to be elected annually.

Sec. 3. Officers of the Society shall provide for holding four Quarterly Meetings, within the limits of the County, at such places as shall suit the wishes of the members.

Sec. 4. When any vacancy shall occur in the offices aforesaid, the officers shall have power, and it is their duty, to fill the same until the next Annual Meeting of the Society.

Sec. 5. The funds of the Society shall be raised by voluntary contribution.

Sec. 6. The Trustees shall hold all moneys and property belonging to the Society, and pay out of the same all necessary expenses of the Society.

Sec. 7. This Constitution and By-Laws can be amended by a majority of the members present at any Annual Meeting of the Society.

A Committee reported the following names for permanent organization under the Constitution:

For President Ryron Allen, of Cambridge; Vice-President, Mrs. Robert Bowsbark, of Geneseo; Secretary, C. H. Doty, of Andover; Trustees E. S. Roberts, of Cambridge, Dr. Jonathan Allen, of Geneseo, Jacob Emery, of Galva.

A brief but touching poem and address was given by C. H. Doty, at 3½ o'clock, on the subject of "Love;" followed by a lecture from Mr. Palmer.

The evening lecture was again given by Mrs. Ballou, on the topic, "What shall we do to be saved?"

The Society then adjourned to meet at Geneseo on the last Sunday in November.

Taken in every sense, the Convention was a decided success. We all feel satisfied, and confident in our work. We feel as though we have set an example of healthy brevity, and wisdom in our organization. None is trammelled in the least in his faith. We have combined on a financial basis, for fiscal and united work. Every one is exhorted to send names to the Secretary to attach to the Constitution.

C. H. DOTY, Sec.

PERSECUTION IN VIRGINIA.

Letter from J. M. Barnes.

DEAR BROTHER:—Some weeks ago I sent you a specimen of Virginia law concerning agents soliciting subscriptions to papers published out of the state. I also sent you a copy of the assessment served upon me by the assessor of this township, amounting to $10 75, including assessor's fee, (assessment notice is below), he being a Methodist preacher, very zealous in the cause, and watchful of heretics. [illegible]

Our court sat on the 29th of August, at which time I applied for a free license on the ground that the JOURNAL, and the Index, of Toledo, were religious papers. I was sworn twice (he did not like the book) before I was allowed to give in my testimony that I took the papers, read and circulated them as religious papers. Next, we called upon one of the stewards of the Methodist Church, whose testimony corroborated mine. He asserted that he had read the JOURNAL to some extent, and the Index regularly, and considered them as religious as the Baltimore Methodist or the Westminster Confession of Faith, (position to the Presbyterian lawyers) that he did not believe all in any one of them, or either one of them, yet he thought there was truth and good in them all.

The judge fined and sustained the assessor, and made me pay the $10 75. While I am thus unjustly taxed, all other preachers can go free when acting as agents, selling books etc. Am not quite crushed or subdued yet. Shall continue to do all I can for the JOURNAL, and am confident that I can do much more for it during the coming year, and perhaps send you forty subscribers, instead of twenty that I have sent during the past year.

The people in this county understand that I am taxed for such malice, or spite, or through prejudice to my religious opinions, so I do not begrudge the assessor his seventy-five cent "fee, or his glory in it any more than I begrudge old Judas his thirty pieces of silver, and his glory among the pious old Jews.

Remarks:—Poor contemptible old theology—every liberal soul must despise her bigoted devotees. If they had the power, they would crush out every liberal paper. They would apply the rack, the burning fagots, and all other implements of torture that she was wont to do, to destroy "Heretics" in past ages. Poor old Virginia: how long is ignorance and intolerance to crush thy fair land?

Go on, good brother; present to the few who will receive the truth of spirit communion, such words of consolation and hope as the angel world shall inspire you to utter, and when you find one anxious to receive the truth, but too poor to pay for this paper, report the case to this office and the names shall go upon the Free List.

Acts and Joint Resolutions Passed by the General Assembly of Virginia at its Session of 1870-71.

Schedule A. No. 187.—Book agents. Any person who shall receive subscriptions for, or shall in any manner furnish newspapers, books, maps, prints, pamphlets or periodicals, other wise than by sale, printed or published beyond the limits of this state, shall be deemed to be a book agent.

Any person desiring to distribute or sell any religious books, newspapers, pamphlets or periodicals, may apply to the judge of the court or corporation in which he may desire to distribute or sell the same, and such a judge, upon being satisfied that the person applying is of character and a proper person to whom to confide the trust of selling or distributing such books, may direct the assessor to grant him a license, with nominal tax only.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall pay a fine of not less than fifty dollars, nor more than one hundred dollars for each offense.

Virginia Montgomery County.—To-wit, I hereby certify that I shall this day assess the license tax imposed by law on James M. Barnes to be tax collector, for the privilege of circulating papers from the 1st of May, 1871, to the 30th of April, 1872.

Under my hand this 4th of August, 1871. Fee 75 cents.

MEDIUM'S DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will allow better facilities for investigators to learn of the locations of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time that we may keep the list of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a fact that some mediums so far forget their self-respect as to speak evil of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are their especial friends. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Roster so soon as we have evidence sufficient of their indulging in such unkindness.

It should be borne in mind that professional visiting mediums must carry reputations with the "manifestations" to open all—which old or decrepit the "manifestations" to open all—which old or decrepit the "manifestations" to open all—which old or decrepit the spirits to [illegible] of confidence and correctly register.

Religio-Philosophical Publishing House.

☞All letters and communications should be addressed to S. S. JONES, 189 South Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

TERMS OF THE
Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3.00 per year, $1.50—6 months, $1.—3 mo.
☞Fifty cents for Three Months on Trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Orders, if pos sible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names ENTERED on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the coming year, with or without further reminder from this office.

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office, whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or else the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 1870, there will be mailed, "Smith J.—15 Dec.—0." The [illegible] If he has only paid to Dec. 15th, 1869, it will have: Smith J.—15 Dec.—0, or perhaps, in the last two figures for the year, as '70 for 1870.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

NUMBER LX.

Strange Manifestations in the Material World—The Pool of Water—An Old Man Taught an Important Lesson—The Pulse of Creation Stopped—Who Arranged the Details?

In tracing the footprints of matter in its various unfoldments, we should never neglect the main point in view—a correct understanding of the varied nature of the forces employed. The human mind in gazing too intently in one direction, is apt to overlook minor details, and fail thereby in observing the action of important principles. In solving certain problems that relate to the elements, we should ever keep in view the fact that there are connected therewith certain passive forces, which operate as easily, noiselessly and perfectly as the process of the germination, growth and development of the acorn into a full-sized oak.

From this manifestation of the passive forces of the universe, a grand lesson may be learned. Philosophers in ages past have, to a certain extent, claimed an active energizing principle to be connected and impregnated with every molecule of matter, when in fact, it is simply passive. In the pool of water which coolly nestles on the hillside, and is conveyed heavenward by the influence of the sun,—there forming a cloud, finally producing the shower or the hailstone,—is a beautiful example of the passive power inherent in matter.

In one sense the arrangement of nature is a machine; in another sense it is not. The electric telegraph, engine, etc., do not generate their own power, whereas in the departments of nature, it is right the reverse. On all sides we see evidence of unceasing operation on the part of the material world. The passive power of the elements, the inherent forces connected therewith, perform many wonderful operations, that are well calculated to puzzle the most careful and scrutinizing mind.

It might be well to inquire more critically into the nature of the passive forces that seem to impregnate all conditions of matter. We traced in our previous article the varied transformation of a pool of water. Now resting on the hillside, it rises gracefully from its bed, ascends the rays of silvery light, forms a beautiful cloud, hugs to its bosom the electric light, moves along on currents of air, becomes raindrops, and falls to the earth again. These varied changes teach an important lesson. This pool of water, after visiting and revisiting the heavens, finally nestles in its old bed, and an engine being near, it is placed in a boiler, and fire being applied thereto, it is changed into steam. What resemblance between the dewdrop, the cloud, the icicle, the pool of water, and the steam that is now moving the ponderous wheel? The same passive power is at work. It moves the train of cars and they go thundering along over the valleys; it does its duty well. It manifests power, but not as man does when he performs manual labor. The former is passive; the latter active. There is no active power in a vacuum—it approaches to nothing, yet it can cause a terrific crash in the elements.

The passive power which causes the seed to germinate, to produce the bud, and then the beautiful blossom, is regarded as belonging to God, and he who would assert to the contrary, woe to him!—he is an infatuated atheist! What does the passive power belong to that changes the water to steam, and then moves the ponderous wheels?

Ha! ha! the world, that living

Look at that little seed nestling [illegible] germination,—he sees the roof of its cozy resting place,—and looks forth on the beautiful world. Upward it rises, and by and by stands forth as king of the forest. Its body weighs twenty tons! There was a passive power in the elements concealed in each molecule of matter that aggregated therefrom twenty tons of material, and without levers, engines, or scaffolds, raised it high in the air. To what does that power belong? Yea, my soul longs for an answer! Pool of sparkling water,—you who have traversed the heavens, surveyed its grandeur, traveled in the gilded avenues of the body, rolled down the cheek of the unfortunate and suffering quenched the thirst of the weary mechanic and laborer,—unfold to me a lesson! What power caused you to glide on rays of silvery light to the bosom of that dark, portentious cloud, and while there shower on the parched vegetation of earth? Ah, thou art a Savior! Live for others; die for others! Who is like thee? Puny man on earth claps thee to his bosom and blesses thee. All vegetation rises gracefully up, and smiles with rainbow-tinted hues as you nestled upon it as dew drops, and who would condemn thee?

"But stop!" says the pool of water; it appears to be angry; it writhes like a serpent and seems to be vexed with all creation. It is determined to go on an errand of destruction! It chances its programme of action. It is conveyed to an engine, fire is applied thereto, and this pool of water is converted into steam, and it moves the ponderous wheels. Passive power accomplished all this. But while confined within the boiler it becomes angry; it bursts, and kills the engineer and fireman, and severely scalds a dozen more. We hear the moans of a little child which that pool of water has scalded, see its spirit pass away, and its body carried to the grave. Ah, this passive power,—it could destroy, could maim, could murder outright, the fairest of earth's children! And does it belong to a God or not? Is it under his direction when it goes on its mission of mercy, and imparts such beautiful tints to vegetation? Does he control it when it gives brilliancy to the eye, rosy hue to the cheeks, cools the fevered lips, restores the system that is racked with pain,—tell us, we are impatient. Tell us, ye believers in an infinite Principle! And when this pool of water rises to the bosom of an angry stormcloud, and manufactures hail-stones,—devils incarnate, and hurles them as missiles of destruction at earth's children, is this same passive power under the control of that same God?

Look at the golden grain that has risen from the earth in your fields—your garden is full of flowers in bloom, sending forth a heaven born fragrance! and you kneel down and thank God for it. Your prayer goes off on the breeze, and seems to die away in whispers in the very presence of God, entirely acceptable to him. You rise from your knees; your eyes are bedewed with tears of happiness, and there tingles in your veins a sense of appreciation that we admire Noble man, you have been blest, and your acknowledgements to God are grand and beautiful. That pool of water heard his benedictions, listened to his prayer, and resolved to teach him a lesson. It glanced toward the sun, at the air, at the various currents of the atmosphere, and at electricity, told them its desires, and with their assistance, off it goes, as a dark, portentous cloud! The old man saw unusual excitement around. A storm was brewing! Claps of thunder followed each other in quick succession. The wind rose, and a terrific hail-storm passed over his farm. His crops were destroyed, cattle maimed, buildings blown down, his wife and children killed—in fact he was completely ruined! The storm passed away, the clouds disappeared, and as he saw the ruin and devastation that followed, this noble old man cursed the God whom he had bowed down before in sweet benedictions. What a lesson he had learned! There were the two extremes! a prayer and benedictions at blessings; a curse when reverses followed!

Ah, child of earth, with each molecule of matter there is a passive power! and if God is omnipresent, he could control it at all times in channels of mercy!

Listen to the voice of reason, and it will teach you a grand lesson. If you thank God for blessings, thank him for curses! If you thank him for a bountiful harvest, thank him for famines, epidemics, and diseases. What a picture! Darkness like a funeral pall hangs over the land. Cholera in 1833 was approaching. The dying are in every house. Groans are heard in the streets. The living can not bury all the dead. The air is full of stench, and the very winds moan and sigh. Thank your God for it! Puny child, let your prayers of thanks sound off on the breeze, and enter the corridors of heaven with the wrecks of families this disease is causing! Be consistent. The pool of water which had went on its errand of destruction, had emigrated to Europe, and as it cooled the fevered brow of the dying, it rose in the heavens as mist, and was wafted to America, where it spread the disease.

This passive power, who controls it? Does it belong to God? If not, to God, to whom? But the cry comes, God works by law! Ha! ha! well what's the difference? Can the responsibility be shifted? That statement does not, can not, transfer the responsibility from him. Whether he works direct, with immediate supervision, or by law, the responsibility rests the same. If he is responsible for the sunshine, refreshing showers, and cooling breezes, he is responsible for the lightning, tornado, waterspout, and all conditions of matter in the material world.

But stop! All the elements seem at rest. The sun don't shine, the air don't move, the vegetation don't grow, all nature is quiet! No sounds greet the ear, no active life anywhere! The blood don't circulate in the veins, the eyes can't see, nor the ears hear. A vast desert waste everywhere! There is a pulse in the Arcana of Nature that has ceased its beatings! Shall we touch it, and cause the sun to shine, he eyes to see, the ears to hear, the blood to circulate? Unnumbered dead, shall we bring you back to life? Sleeping infant on a mother's bosom, shall we cause the ruddy hue of health to bloom again? Glorious old sun, shall we unlock the chains that bind you? Mighty cities now locked in sleep, shall we arouse you from slumber again? Sparkling waters, shall we allow you to move through the valley? Oh, will the illustrious dead, whose destiny we hold in our hand, answer? Yes, shall we touch this pulse again, and bring back all to life? We pause: we awaken misery as well as happiness; the tornado as well as the refreshing shower; pestilence as well as health; famine as well as prosperity and happiness. If we arouse the world to activity, we alone are responsible for all its happiness—all its misery! We can touch the pulse, or not—we touch it, and all things move in their accustomed course! Did not God—your God touch the pulse first?—yes, puny child, more than that, he had the arrangement of all the details. Did he arrange for that church, that house of assignation, that pool of licentiousness, that benevolent asylum—did he have any details or not? Ah! tell us. Our soul yearns for an answer. The cry comes forth that we are an atheist! Inquisitive, cool, calculating, and determined, we ask it when the pulse of creation was first touched by your God, did he arrange the details, for seasons of prosperity and adversity, for famines, and wars, and pestilence? Here, you say that when he works, he enters into minute details? Did he not arrange the system of creation? And if he did not inaugurate a system of action in the elements and among mankind, who did? Thank him, then, for details; for all conditions of life; for the plaintive cry of sorrow that comes forth like funeral train from some sad heart; for the house of assignation; for the low brothel; for intemperance, for all things!

We pause in our search. It is now dark—princely mansions on Wabash and Michigan Avenues are lighted. The bells have ceased ringing, choirs singing, preachers praying, or worshiping an unknown God. On the sidewalk below are pattering feet—young girls fair and beautiful (lost!—

"For e's nothing lost, though changed,"—so teaches our chemist seer, who preaches of Nature's plan,
And glibly praises the economy that reaches Beyond the mental range of prying man.)

pass along like current of consciousness. Other houses are grandly illuminated. There are the fairest flowers of creation! Should we venture there, the world would condemn us. Listen, the music is fine, and at the piano one is singing "Home, sweet home," and as she sings, do angels listen, or are only devils incarnate there? The tears roll down her cheeks—ah, she, too, has tender emotions! Once a child, and with her sweet lips pressed to her mother's, little did she anticipate this life! The clock strikes ten, and we, too, as we feel of the heart of this great city, shed tears, and wonder if God arranged the details when he first brought the universe into existence.

Letter of Inquiry.

BROTHER JONES:—In your experience in the philosophy of spirit communion, does it matter whether the person receiving the communication and the medium are strangers to each other, or intimate friends; or, is it possible for the magnetism between any two men and the medium to become so blended as to be a hindrance to the spirit in communicating through the medium as easily and as freely as though they were merely acquaintances; in other words, is it possible for any two persons in the earth life, to become so congenial,—one being a susceptible medium,—as to make it difficult, or create a hindrance to a spirit giving reliable communications through the medium?

Yours in truth,

A. M.

REPLY:—We have often had occasion to speak from observation in regard to spirit communion. Those who go to mediums, carry conditions with them, favorable or unfavorable, for spirits to approach and control. Hence it is, that one person will get good communications through one medium, and another will get nothing through that medium, but will get reliable communications through some other medium.

The philosophy of spirit control is but little understood by the most careful observers. That there is a subtle element through which spirits control media, even as there is a subtle element through which the spirit yet in the physical form controls its own body through the nervous system, we have no doubt.

That element is strengthened or weakened by surrounding conditions or elements, which are adapted to aid, or the contrary. The elements of certain individuals and physical things interblend, and aid, or repel and destroy, the power of spirits to control and communicate under favorable conditions. Spirits can handle and move physical objects,—such as moving the stone from the sepulchre—throwing stones—carrying Home out of the fifth story window, and in at another, and many others up to the ceiling, and about rooms, etc., etc.

This element is at times stronger or weaker as different conditions exist. The science of chemistry will doubtless take cognizance of this subject. Scientists will not always be noted for cowardice.

Observation serves to indicate that the elements of two individuals may become so interblended, that one becomes subservient to the will of the other. In such a case, a spirit who has been accustomed to controlling the negative person referred to as a medium, seems to lose power to do so, when a commudication is desired by such familiar friend. In other cases no such hindrance is apparent. Hence we are unable to lay down any reliable rules in reference to the subject. Observation would seem to teach, that where such familiarity exists between individuals, the power to heal is proportionately diminished; and yet there are apparently, exceptions to that rule.

From our observation, we are inclined to believe that a magnetic element is imparted from spirits through mediums, which interblends with a similar element in a sick person, which causes a chemical change resulting in health, where disease before obtained. This result may be produced by the laying on of medium's hands, or by the positive and negative elements applied to the sick person as his disease shall require, though he may be thousands of miles away from the medium, as is daily done through the wonderful mediumistic powers of Mrs. A. H. Robinson, of Chicago.

The contact of the medium with the sick person, enables the spirits for the time being, to impart their magnetism to the patient.

Through the positive and negative elements prepared by Mrs. Robinson while under spirit control, in the form of magnetized paper for each individualized case, spirits are enabled to follow their own magnetism so imparted, directly to the sick person, and remain en rapport with them, accomplishing a cure so long as the magnetized paper shall continue to hold the subtle element so imparted to it. If a permanent cure is not effected before such element is dissipated, it then becomes necessary to renew it. It seems to occupy the place of a good healing medium who from day to day manipulates the sick person, with this advantage, it is a substitute for continuous manipulation, so long as were, with a perfect adaptation to each individual case—the magnetic element having been prepared by spirit physicians, and especially adapted to specific cases—knowledge of which is obtained through the lock of hair sent to the spirit medium, for the purpose of a diagnosis.

So little is known of the nature or philosophy of disease and cure, that no one can advance a theory with any certainty of correctness or satisfaction to himself that a little more observation will not entirely overthrow it.

Perhaps some one will be disposed to discuss this important subject more at length from his standpoint of observation. Perhaps he or she will tell us how it is mediums take a disease from patients when diagnosing their cases, as daily occurs with Mrs. Robinson, though many hundreds of miles from the sick person, she simply holding a lock of their hair in her hand, and in some cases even when the letter containing the lock of hair remains unopened on the table before her.

A case in point. A few days since, she had a case of severe salt-rheum, the patient being far away. She took the disease upon her hands secretly it continuing several days before it disappeared. The class of facts are of daily occurrence, and closely allied to the subject of our correspondent's inquiries. It is an important subject, and worthy the attention of the most observant. Our columns are open to its discussion.

The Index—Frothingham.

It is really amusing to see our small contemporaries around the country, bark, snarl, scold, and deride the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. The last old emanates from the Index, a weekly paper devoted to Free Religion, and sent forth from Toledo, Ohio, and one would suppose on reading it, that its editor was an old orthodox maid, devoted to celibacy, instead of anything else. When we read this acrid frightful wail of hot water, potato smashers, and sundry cooking utensils, rose up before us, as if to intimidate us into his obedience. But what was our crime? Ah! it consisted in expunging from Frothingham's address on Superstition, which we published a few weeks ago, a little religious debris, or hodge offal, and sanctimonious dirt, which he had collected together, as a palatable dish to present to Spiritualists—because we expunged that from the address, the old maidish ire of the editor of the Index is excited. We are not in the habit of presenting a plate of religious debris for our reader to eat, and shall continue to pursue the same course, though all Free Religionists journals in the land deride us for so doing.

Frothingham, as a liberal man, as a profound thinker, as a gentleman of fine literary attainments, we admire,—but when we set our table for a spiritual feast, and place choice delicties on the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, we do n't wish to present as dessert, such pastiness as his lips are capable of giving utterance to. The object of the RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL is not to publish all the foul emanations that such men as Frothingham are capable of uttering against Spiritualism. While we will freely give publicity to rare gems of thought that he may give utterance to, we prefer to leave the other extreme—the debris that can fall from his lips—to the exclusive use of the Index.

The Index, devoted to Free Religion, no doubt has a mission, but its pages are too small, its columns too short, and its circulation too limited, to be devoted to giving utterance to snarls and snaps at us because we fail to present to the readers of the JOURNAL some of the dirt that Frothingham had shaken from his lips. We purpose to present to our readers each week, a table well filled with all that is palatable, but to serve up therewith all the dirt that some illiberal Free-Religionist can collect, we can not consent to do.

An Itinerant Gospel-Vender.

BROTHER JONES:—I inclose you a slip cut from the St. Joseph Herald, in which the local editor describes the numerous culprits as they appeared before the recorder on Monday morning last. What must have been the condition of this "lamb of God," this "shining light," before he became regenerated?

D. W.

"Rev. David Roderick is an itinerant Gospel vender, but on the Sabbath day, when he should have been filling an appointment in the pulpit, he was around town absorbing all the liquids in the shape of "benzine" that he could get hold of, and then went about butting lamp posts and beating the sidewalks with his head, and exercising so many other little freaks of that nature that the city guardians confined him within the circumference of a very small space fearing that he might butt down something, and thus superadd no a loss to the city for repairs. The reverend gentleman's face when he appeared before the recorder very much resembled a log-cabin patchwork quilt wrought in high colors. He had a "bay-window" under his left eye, a lot of "moss agates" over the other, a "mansard roof" on his forehead, his nose was weatherboarded with divers pieces of sticking-plaster, and his whole countenance resembled a "brown stone front." Meekly did this humble and lowly follower plead guilty to the charge of drunkenness, and the pillars of the church for which he is now organ-grinder paid about $8.50 for him, whereupon he went forth to prosecute his soul-saving calling."

REMARKS:—From our inmost soul we pity the poor inebriate whose love for intoxicating drink takes captive his very being.

Spiritualism, the Philosophy of Life, points to antemortal conditions which in united as organism for his soul that at times runs mad, and with the fury of a whirlwind prostrates his external being to the very depths of degradation. Then after the terrible convulsion has passed, his religious nature, so called, which lies in close proximity to the propensities, is aroused and he goes upon the rostrum as a revival preacher, and thousands are "moved by the spirit" to "love Jesus." Reason has no lot or part in the matter in either case. It is all the work of the passions.

May good angels speed the day that common sense—reason—shall be the pole-star by which mankind shall be governed.

Mysterious Phenomenon.

At the new store next to Lyon's livery stable, occupied at present by Trainham & Mordrosl, stationers and book-sellers, upon one side, and on the other by Mr. ——, as a boot and shoe store, there has been witnessed, nightly, by numerous citizens of the highest respectability, the most curious and startling phenomena. Inkstands, books, and all kinds of articles are lifted from their respective places and hurled from one end of the store to the other by invisible agency; in many instances much to the detriment of the article thrown. Heavy pegcutters, shoe lasts, reaps, hammers, and other heavy articles, are thrown about with as little apparent effort as if they were feathers or straws, and all this in the presence of critical observers, and with lights burning brightly all around the room. On Tuesday night over thirty of our best citizens visited the building, and witnessed the most wonderful and startling sights and sounds.—Daily State Journal (Austin Texas).

We are indebted to General W. H. Parsons, of Austin, Texas, for a copy of the paper from which we clip the above.

Spiritual phenomena are multiplying rapidly. Spirits seize upon opportune moments, conditions being favorable, to display their power in moving tangible objects.

Such manifestations, indicative of an intelligent will, carries conviction of the truth of the Spiritual philosophy, reaching thousands of minds which would not heed theorizing, however plausible.

Despite the assertions to the contrary, by authors who write on the subject of spirit communion, phenomenal spiritual manifestations are rapidly on the increase. It is hardly necessary for us to say that this phase of phenomena is doing more to convince the world of the truth of spirit communion than all other phases combined. We say it is hardly necessary for us to so state, inasmuch as the intelligences of the spirit world adopt that method. If it were not wise to do so, they would pursue an entirely different course to make the world appreciate their nearness and powers of communion.

Why a few authors and speakers persist in saying that phenomenal Spiritualism is dying out, thus denying facts that stare every one in the face, is a mystery to the mass of observers. We look upon it as important in this light: Men and women in the past have all been idolatrous worshipers—worshiping men and things. They have had their calendar of saints. The saints in Spiritualism will find few worshipers if they continue to deny facts—stubborn facts which are daily multiplying, and coming within the observation of the masses.

Believing the day has come for common sense to take the place of the worship of heroes and saints, we feel rather gratified than otherwise when we read the statements of would-be-calendared saints in Spiritualism, denying phenomenal Spiritualism.

We know quite a number who take it upon themselves to denounce this journal whenever they think they can produce an effect, because it presents to its readers all phases of spirit communion. Some of these are in the millionary service!

Mrs. Mossop.

We had the pleasure of listening to a lecture by Mrs. A. E. Mossop at the hall on the corner of Randolph and Jefferson streets, on Sunday evening last. She does not seem to feel the effects of old theological bondage in the Catholic Church, as she gives utterance to inspired thoughts from the angel world. At the conclusion of her address on "Be ye temperate in all things," she described many spirits in the audience, using the most chaste and beautiful language. She repeated to one present the dying words of a spirit friend, which he, after the meeting had closed, acknowledged as correct.

She is now ready to make engagements for the fall and winter months. Her permanent address is in care of J. G. Walt, Sturgis, Michigan. She can be addressed for the present in care of this office.

Reports.

We publish this week the conclusion of the report of the proceedings of the National Convention of Spiritualists, held at Troy. The addresses will be found particularly interesting. The JOURNAL is alive to the importance of keeping its readers well supplied with everything relating to Spiritualism in the United States and Europe.

Donation to Joseph Baker.

Mrs. E. R. Pierce, of Alton, Illinois, donates $1.00 to Bro. Baker. Her example is worthy of imitation.

D. W. Hull.

Our good Brother D. W. Hull, gave us a call a few days ago. He is doing a good work for Spiritualism.

Personal and Local.

—Mr. O. P. Kellogg will speak in Corry, Pa., on Sunday, Oct. 15th, at half past ten o'clock in the morning, and seven in the evening.

—Selden J Finney has again been elected State Senator in California. He was at one time a prominent Spiritualist minister.

—Theophilanthropists.—Recent circumstances have brought up the name which precedes. It was a society started by Thomas Paine, and those who, like him, believed in a divinity, but did not recognize Jesus Christ as God. Their motto was, "Any system of religion that shocks the mind of a child can not be a true system; the world is my country and to do good is my religion." This society has many members in the North and great West, who are organized. In California, also, there are many members.

—T. J. Peabody, Esq., of Wallula, W. T., says: "Send me one dozen bottles Nature's Hair Restorative—prepay charges to San Francisco. You sent me a box containing eighty bottles, some time since, and I like it very much indeed."

—The many friends and patrons of Dr. J. A. Clark will be happy to learn that after a few month's absence from the city, he has returned, and may be found at his office, rooms 13 and 14, Sheppard Block, Southeast corner of Monroe and Dearborn streets. We are personally acquainted with Dr. Clark and his powers as a healer, and can cheerfully recommend him to our readers.

—Hon. Thomas Richmond, author of "God Dealing with Slavery," is at Rutland, Vt. He has been renewing his age among the Green Mountains.

—A. D. Willis, the spirit artist, is located in St. Louis, Mo.

—Mrs. Emma Hardinge lectured in Granite Hall, Chelsea, Sunday evening, October 1st, at half past seven o'clock. Subject, "The Signs of the Times"

—Prof. Chaney is now lecturing in Oregon. He is not only a Spiritualist, but a prominent astrologist.

—Drs J. C. and A. D. Howes have been successfully healing the sick in Iowa.

—E. Graves will lecture at Hannibal, Mo, during November, on Sundays, and on mid week evenings will speak at all accessible points where the necessary arrangements can be made. Let Spiritualists of all neighboring towns notice this. Previous to November he will lecture at various places in Indiana, Illinois and Iowa. The friends of free thought at Chandlerville, Ill., are arranging to have him debate the following resolutions with the Rev. Mr. Raines:

Resolved, That the book called the Bible contains a series of communications to man, made by the spirits of the departed through the living.

Resolved That various phenomena included in the term, modern Spiritualism, are recognized by the Christian Bible.

Resolved That the religion and morality taught by modern Spiritualism, is superior to the religion and morality of the Christian Bible.

E. K. Graves affirms, Rev. John A. Raines denies.

—Oswego, Labette Co., Kansas. S. A. Crane desires lecturers and school teachers—Spiritualists, to correspond with him upon the subject of teaching and lecturing in Kansas.

—We are glad to notice an increasing demand for Lola Walsbrooker's books, "Alice Vale" and "Helen Harlow's Vow."

—At the Annual Mechanic's Institute Exposition and Fair, recently held at San Francisco, the prize of one hundred dollars in gold was awarded to Solomon W. Jewett, Esq., for the best essay on the culture of cotton by actual experiment in California.

—Charles H. Read is still giving seances in various parts of the country, and is doing a good work.

—Brother Richard Walker desires to know whether or the "Brinkley College Ghost Story" is a humbug or not. We would say that the statements published in the JOURNAL were, and are now, regarded as facts.

—Bishop A. Beals has been lecturing successfully in various parts of Pennsylvania during the summer.

—Our thanks are due to many of our friends for sending us interesting extracts from various papers relating to Spiritualism.

—Brother Charles Bradway is battling for Spiritualism in Iowa, and is doing a good work.

"Hour by hour, like an opening flower,
Shall truth after truth expand;
The sea may grow pale, and the stars may fall,
But the purpose of God shall stand.
Dogmas and creeds without kindred deeds,
And altar and face, shall fall;
One bond of love, and one home above,
And one faith, shall be to all."

—Rev. W. H Milburn, the blind preacher, well known throughout the country, has acceded from the Episcopal church and returned to his first love, the Methodist. On being told he should have consulted his friends first, he replied he was "going it blind." Guess he is!

—Mrs. Addie L. Ballou starts this week for Carlyle, Ill., to lecture.

—A specimen of the wonderful plant, "The Flower of the Holy Ghost," has been successfully raised in Norwich, Connecticut. The flower is a creamy white cup, nearly as large as half an egg, and extremely beautiful, and its wonder as a natural floral growth is the fact that in this flower is a little pure white dove, with pink bill and eyes, and its head turned as if looking over its back. Its wings, feet, bill, etc., are as absolutely perfect as those of the living dove, whose counterpart this wonderful mimic bird is.

—Brother J. W. Evans is doing a g od work for Spiritualism at Centralia, Ill.

—WAS IT PROVIDENTIAL?—On Sunday, September 10th, as a party of men, women and children, in a large wagon, were on their way to a grove, to spend the day in recreation and relief from the past week's hard toil, while crossing a railroad track near this city, the horses baulked, and before they could be got off the track, a train of cars struck them, killed four of the party, and wounded six or eight more, some mortally, and others seriously. When we were young, half a century ago, serious accidents, when occurring on Sunday to pleasure parties, were considered by the pious to be judgements of the Lord on the sinful actions of the victims; and those who providentially escaped were considered equally warned of the danger of the terrible penalty awaiting sinners in the life to come; but now such excursions have lost their wicked character entirely, except when a few bigots, or weaklings, and the providences are more rare, while the accidents are largely increased. —Warren Chase

NO. VII.

[CONCLUDED.]

How shall we enter this condition?

The profound interest that is awakened on this important subject has caused this question to be asked by many all over the land, and we will try to answer it.

First, however, we must say that no fixed rule can be laid down for all persons.

Every one who has experienced the abstraction known as "a brown study," in which external scenes and objects pass more or less completely from our consciousness, has experienced the first step of the entrance into this state.

The course recommended by Dr. Fahnestock, and the one that is frequently successful, is to sit or lie in a quiet position, and closing the eyes, endeavor to fix the attention of the mind upon some distant place where there are pleasant associations, and make an effort to see this. If the mind can thus be drawn away the person robs the state. Care must be taken not to disturb them. We should speak to them in a pleasant and encouraging manner, and if we find them going into the state, an important step will be gained. Do not continue the experiment long enough to weary the person, nor repeat it until there is a willingness on their part. If this does not succeed, we recommend the person to fix their attention upon some object; looking steadily at a point will sometimes do it; by fixing the mind upon some part of their own system a sensitive person will soon feel a tingling sensation, and the first step is introduced. It should be borne in mind that the object is to change the relation of the mind to the body, so that the will may be enabled to exercise more power over it.

Any of the numerous plans of magnetising persons may aid us in getting into this state, for, however erroneous may be the idea, the state itself does not differ essentially from these, and all that is necessary is to disabuse the mind of the errors that have been impressed upon it while in a negative condition. Every magnetiser has noticed that the subjects have passed from under their control often to that of spirits who have impressed them with the fact of their independence—if they only willed it.

We had been in this state hundreds of times, and supposed we were only able to enter it under the influence of some spirit or moral friend, and while we supposed this, we could not.

Whether we should have been able to go into this without the training and influence is a question. Our friend, Dr. Fahnestock, thinks we could. We do not, and are thankful for all the aid that has been given to us.

Thousands of persons have gone into this state ignorantly, and owing to the like ignorance on the part of those around them, have been made to suffer all that they could, although the unconsciousness of the condition has often saved their lives. We think a knowledge of the best means of aiding and directing persons in this state, especially in their earlier experiences, is quite as important as a knowledge of the means of entering it. Our friend, Dr. Fahnestock, has been imparting this knowledge to all he could, and we hope to be able to aid many. Every one who has made a subject for magnetism should be instructed in this regard to this condition, in order that they may lay aside the errors and false impressions which they have received, and enter upon the true path of investigation. Dr F. thinks we are in a minature yet. We are in search of truth, and desire the highest and best revelations of this that we can obtain. We accept nothing without evidence that satisfies us of its truth.

Where persons have been influenced by spirits or mortals, the proper plan is to ask them to remain in the state after the influence ceases to be active and to report upon them, and in most cases much difficulty in showing them that their own wills play an important part in the production of the condition, and that if they will learn to exercise them properly they can control the conditions and pleasure, and may go in and out when they will to do so.

Let there be no misunderstanding here. We have been charged with "abandoning Spiritualism," "leaving our spirit friends out in the cold," and "denying all forms of mediumship," than which, nothing can be farther from the truth. Our confidence in Spiritualism increases with every day's experience and the extension of our knowledge; our spirit friends, instead of being "out in the cold," have a warmer reception with us now that we can more readily induce the conditions in which they become to us as real as any mortals, and mediumship is valuable and practical in proportion to the perfection of this state.

From the very first stage of this condition, a person becomes subject to spirit influence, and the consciousness of the physical renders them susceptible to the influence, and so through the varied stages until there is the profound unconsciousness of deep trance, in which the spirit of the individual is gone, and that of another soul uses its organism to give utterance to its thoughts.

The fact of the separation of the spiritual from the physical body, is of the highest importance, and for this reason we have spoken of it frequently At night, or during sleep, the spirit leaves the body, and there are physical manifestations indicating the condition of the body. How often do persons waken, feeling distressing symptoms in various portions of the body, which are the result of physical irregularities or violations, which express themselves under these circumstances, but are subdued or held in abeyance by the spiritual powers during the waking condition. Every careful observer may notice these, and learn a lesson of practical value to themselves. How often do persons, on waking in the morning, find themselves but little refreshed from the night's sleep, and this is an indication that there should be something done to change and improve the physical condition.

When a person wakes and the spirit has returned to the body, the first thing should be a well directed effort to send the forces of the will to every portion of the body, and endeavor, if possible, to establish the proper equilibrium which constitutes health. If any be specially weakness or pain, or the limbs be cold, these deserve special attention, and the will should be firmly directed toward that with a resolute determination. Strengthen the weak part, or remove the pain and warm the limbs.

There are few acts in life more important than getting awake properly. It is a common saying that a person has got out of bed wrong when they are ill natured.

Statuvolence teaches that we should not only do this when waking, but whenever, during the day we find the system getting out of order in any part of it, we should pause and endeavor to set it right, just as the good and careful engineer does with his engine. Almost all the diseases that afflict humanity might thus be checked and prevented if this useful application of the will were properly understood, and the precautions of diet and regime carefully noted and related. Where individuals can not do this alone, they should seek the aid of those around them, and we should all join in producing these results, and, instead of complaining and discouraging those around us, each one should endeavor to strengthen the determination to be strong and well.

We remember an anecdote of a man who had a very positive will, who was attacked with a malignant fever. Looking into the face of the physician he said, "You need not be afraid to tell me what you think of my case."

"Well," said he, "I do not think you have one chance in a thousand to get well."

"Oh," said the patient with an oath, which we more strong than polite, "——, I will take that."

He did so, and got well.

To sum up the position, statuvolence,—a state induced by the will, making a condition in which the will is raised to perform the highest and best acts it is capable of, to all it can to make us strong and well in the waking state, and in those conditions usually known as mediumship, where the soul is more or less separated from the direct connection with the body it has been found by us that the will is the means of producing this state, and while the individual is in this state, Dr. F. has also discovered and applied the important fact that a resolution, a fixed determination, will accomplish almost any conceivable result. We have given this the human will approaches nearest to omnipotence of anything else, and by the practice of this system we shall doubtless reach more definite and clear ideas of what the will is, and how far its potency may be extended in the culture of the faculties with which we are endowed

We have given in these articles to present our views and impressions of this grand subject; we commend it to the careful study and practice of all thoughtful minds, and many hereafter present further experiences in this wonderful field.

The Cause in Philadelphia.

During the summer months we have had a vacation. We have now taken the large hall at the northeast corner of Broad and Spring Garden streets, one of the finest in our city for the purpose of meetings. On Sunday, the first of October, our young friend, Orpheus S. Lyon, of Massachusetts, occupied our rostrum. He is a graduate of the Charlestown Lyceum, and by no means a stranger to the Spiritualists of the West, and indeed everywhere where the JOURNAL and Banner of Light are read. He gave us two very pleasant practical "thanksgiving" lectures on the occasion of opening our meetings for the season.

It gives us great satisfaction to say that Brother Lyon did well, and we do not hesitate to recommend him to the friends of the cause as a young man of sterling integrity. We trust he may be able to speak on the rostrum all over our land, and give the "sweet key notes of Spiritualism" to the friends everywhere.

A Correction.

In our article number two of statuvolence, in number twenty four of the JOURNAL, Sep. 23rd, 1871 we say, "Sir Ashley Cooper made an important discovery in regard to the nerves of motion and sensation."

It was Sir Charles Bell, and we desire to make the amende honorable to him in spirit-life. It is a long time since we have referred to the history of this discovery, as recorded in medical works of the day.

When I am dead I in spirit will seek my brave companions on the Champs Elysees. Yea, Kleber, Desaix, Bessieres, Duroc, Ney, Murat, Massena, Bertier—all will come to meet me. We will speak of the scenes we passed through together, and I will relate to them the last events of my life. On seeing me again they will be inspired with renewed ardor. We will speak of the wars of Scipio, Cæsar, Hannibal and Frederick, finding pleasure in so doing—at least, he added, with a smile, "if in the world beyond they do not fear to see so many people together."—Napoleon First on the Isle of St. Helena.

There can not be such a chasm between this life and the next as shall amount to a non log mental continuity. If there is, the next life is not a next life, for another one appears it is, and is at once might just as well begin there. —John Grote.

If memory were lost, the life would be but waste, and the new man born there as new as if he had never been here. —Ibid.

The popular notion that a good man at death becomes a kind of inferior deity, an angel, a notion absolutely without warrant in Scripture, and imported into Christianity from a totally different system of thought, would involve a solution of continuity almost as complete as the extinction of memory. Too much would rise, not himself developed, into a new being, with a brain, for example, so enlarged that nothing done in the original life could seem of importance, so free from the limitations of human nature as to be unable to benefit by human experience. The link with the past would be broken as completely as by the disappearance of memory, every act and circumstance showing in a light so different that their old meaning would disappear, would cease to be a meaning. The man angel would be studying as he looked back, not himself, but an inferior creature between whom and him self would be no binding link except compassion. It is hard enough to conceive how identity can continue when the body has disappeared; how just could, when newly embodied, when freed from those mysterious restraints which the present body imposes on it, from the colorings of it which the faculties it, from the limits within which it confines it for instance, mental fatigue must be an accident of the corporeal medium—can retain the same mind at all, any more than a man's identity could remain the same if, being in all circumstances of ancestry, training, etc., English, he became by miracle in all these circumstances French. It is nearly as difficult to conceive of the junction, between the mind as it is at the end of one life, and the mind as it is at the beginning of another, of material sin, but devoid of the possibility of sin; between minds as we know them, and minds to which an unknown future is never present; but if, in addition to all these changes, so wide reaching in their influence, the powers are not gradually developed, but erroneously and suddenly expanded the identity would be inconceivably increased. The ageless and beautiful thought which has cheered so many bereaved ones, that separation is only for a time, would be without object; for though we should meet again, it would be in relations to which the former relations would have no relation. The love between parent and child, for example, so far as it is not the result of circumstances and physical similarity of constitution—all which circumstances and similarity must cease at death.—Ibid

Obituary.

Died, at New York, Sept. 26th, of paralysis, Jacob Watson Barron, formerly of the La Crosse Republican, in the 79 year of his age.

Bro. Barron was a staunch believer in spirit communion, and did not hesitate on proper occasions to avow his faith. He, when a resident in this city, took a deep interest in the cause of Spiritualism—especially in the Children's Progressive Lyceum. His son Charley was a lad of uncommon promise in those days. He will miss a loving parent. May the aiteen father be enabled to make his nearness perceptible to the external senses of his beloved son.

Passed from earth, on his 48th birthday, September 27th, A. G. Wilde, of Sanilac County, Mich. He lived for the last twenty years in Sanilac county. In the last months he carefully realized the presence of ministering spirits. He leaves a wife and four little children, who were wholly dependent on him for support, to mourn the loss of his physical presence and sustaining care. Let us hope that the Spiritualists of Sanilac County will be mindful of his widow and her father less children in their affliction. The funeral was attended by a large number of persons who were addressed by the writer.

An Entirely New Proposition.

We now have in press, and will be ready to fill orders before this notice reaches our readers a splendid new book, entitled THE SUNDAY QUESTION, and SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE.

This work consists of 123 large, closely printed pages It is an exhaustive review of the so-called Sunday question, and self-contradictions of the Bible. The work shows the so-called divine authority for the supposed holy day, to be the cunning device of designing priests rather than the inspiration of an Infinite God! This work, which we sell for the low price of fifty cents, and send the same free of postage on the receipt of the money, we will send to any old subscriber on receipt of seventy-five cents, together with the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL to any new subscriber on trial for three months; or, we will send the same work and the JOURNAL for three months on trial and for a new subscriber, on the receipt of seventy-five cents. For one dollar, we will send for a new subscriber, the JOURNAL three months and the above-named book, together with that very remarkable book called LIFE'S UNFOLDINGS, or The Wonders of the Universe Revealed to Man.

We hope that every subscriber to whom we are now sending the JOURNAL will avail him or herself of this generous offer, and thus secure these books, as well as to thus aid in doubling the number of the subscribers to the JOURNAL.

MRS. A. M. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago,

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when the spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember life is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced; that science takes cognisance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well who the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

TERMS:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $2.00; each subsequent, $1.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $5; answering Business Letters, $5. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

of the audience. A recitation by Grace Lodewick, and another by Mamie Laurence, were extremely interesting. A quartette, "Music on the Lake," by Messrs. Marble, White, and others was sung with excellent effect. A fine recitation by Master Joey Kapstein, was succeeded by a duet by Misses Emma Barto and Emma Wilbur, and a recitation by Master Frankie McCoy. The latter was one of the best things on the programme and was very pretty rendered.

The gymnastic exercises by a group of the children began part second, and were an excellent introduction to a really splendid series of entertainments. Miss Nettie Vosburgh's recitation and "Little Joe" sung by Josie Hatfield, were loudly applauded as was a song, not on the programme. "The Old Easy Chair by the Fire," sung by Mr Marble. An opera air by Ella Holcomb was much admired. The recitations by Alice Merritt, Carrie Brophy, J. McDonald, and Charles Gray, and another quartette by Messrs. Marble, White, and others, worthily closed the performance.

THURSDAY MORNING SESSION.

George A. Bacon in the chair. A letter was read from Agnes Cook, of Indiana. The following communication from John M. Spear was read:

To the American Association of Spiritualists assembled at Troy, New York: Brothers and brothers, permit me to say a few words with my pen, it being impossible to be with you in person. In no place west of the Rocky Mountains have Spiritualists a desire to attend a convention; and therefore I desire to present my blessed cause, as accomplished by individuals. I have lectured in California and in the Territories during the two years I have been on the Pacific coast, and have done what I could to establish meetings and societies. Spiritualism, with other themes, might be considered. In San Francisco, we have an excellent Sunday meeting, called the Lyceum of Self culture, in which the leading Spiritualists take an active part. Its officers are two men and three women.

At Salt Lake City, Utah, which is nearly nine hundred miles from San Francisco, are some earnest Spiritualists, who propose to organize a society and to receive lecturers, and to do whatever else may come before them. The Liberal Institute recently built by some liberal persons, is at their disposal. Mormonism is based on spiritual revelation, as a people, they reject Spiritualism. I have made three visits to Salt Lake City.

I noticed that the Richmond Convention revived the thought acted upon at the Cleveland Convention, of forming a World's Conference of Spiritualists at London, New York or elsewhere. Allow me to say that the committee appointed at the Cleveland Convention, did what they could, which was not much, the spiritual public mind not being then prepared to promote it. In 1869 in London, a small international Conference was held in 1869 in London, in which Russia, Prussia, Italy, France, England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland and America were represented, either by personal presence or by letter. The Russian address, written by M. Axcoof, of St. Petersburg and translated by Signor Damiani, and the American address, written by Dr. Henry T. Child, of Philadelphia, were published in the London Human Nature, conducted by Mr. James Burns.

I then felt that in about three years a second international conference might with profit be called, and was highly gratified to learn that Brother Peebles had visited England to promote this work, for, in my humble opinion there is no one more important work in which Spiritualists may engage than it is uniting by spiritual revelation, man with nation, and world with world, the oldest to the dawn of that glorious, long predicted and much desired day when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Let me add, in conclusion, that it is now twenty years since I chose fifty gave myself unreservedly to the spread of phenomenal, philosophical and practical Spiritualism; have traveled many hundred thousand miles in the Old and the New Worlds; have uttered the loss of many things I once highly valued, yet Spiritualism has done much more for me than I have for it.

Fraternally,

J. M. SPEAR.

San Francisco, Cal. Sept. 4th, 1871.

A report was received from James M. Peebles as follows:

On the subject of a world's convention we report no definite results. It seems that the general feeling is that the time has not yet arrived for such a convention.

The committee was released.

Mr. Wheelock, from the Committee on Education, appointed last year, reported that they had no plans to present. They were also released.

The report of Mr. H. F. Brown, of Iowa, with it appears he has been laboring two months, with encouraging prospects.

The report of the Literary Committee was further considered, and on motion of Mr. Gardner, the following resolution was adopted unanimously:

Resolved that the report of the Committee on Lyceums and the destitute, proposed by Mr. Wheeler, be referred to the board of trustees to digest the subject matter of the report, and prepare an address to the Spiritualists at large.

On motion of Dr Gardner, the board was instructed to have the report published in all the spiritual papers in this country.

The hour fixed for the election having arrived, Charles Holt, E. Annis Simmons, and Levi K. Gormly were appointed tellers.

Charles C. Woodhull, Henry G. Gardner, M. D., and Robert T. Hollick, M. D., were nominated.

The tellers reported that Dr. Gardner had twenty-five votes, Dr. Hallock twenty-five votes, and Mrs. Woodhull twenty three.

On motion, the meeting proceeded to a second ballot.

The tellers reported that Mrs. Woodhull had received forty two votes. Dr. Gardner thirty-six. Mrs. Woodhull was declared elected.

Mrs. Hatch introduced the newly-elected President, saying:

"Friends, we have most of us, and perhaps all of us, been looking away toward Washington, nominating the months, and before we should have the pleasure of voting for Victoria C. Woodhull: We have passed for a moment, and elected her President of the American Association of Spiritualists. I am happy to introduce her, a brave-souled woman, to stand where I have stood during the past year."

Mrs. Woodhull said:

"I scarcely know what to say in return for the honor you have bestowed upon me. When I started to come to Troy, my heart was very faint. I felt that I should meet a great many persons who misunderstood me, and I had an assurance that your hearts were in the right, and that, if I had been misunderstood, when I reached out my hand it would be received. All I have to say is, by my work ye shall know me!"

Dr. Gardner said: "I most heartily thank you for the honor you have done me."

The tellers reported that Dr. H. T. Child had received forty votes, E. G. Granville sixteen, for Secretary.

On motion, Dr. Gardner was requested to cast the ballot of the Association for Levi Weaver, for Treasurer, he being the only nominee. He was elected.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The tellers reported that A. A. Wheelock and Lizzie M. Middlebrook had received a majority of the votes cast for trustees, and they were declared elected for the ensuing three years.

The following resol[illegible]:

Resolved that this [illegible] and re-affirm, as embodying [illegible] of Spiritualism, as at [illegible] following,

[illegible] is not endowed with [illegible] ation of Inspiration, whether in the form of [illegible] tions, platforms, or creeds, is but the expression [illegible] opinion by those who favor the affirmation

[illegible] ndard, they the interchange of thought and [illegible] ance between individuals in this life and those [illegible] have passed beyond it, as a truth established not only by our own experience, but by the concurrent testimony of all nations, in all ages of the world, so far as their records and traditions have reached.

Resolved that the "seercess" of the Bible, the prophecies and inspirations which it recites, were inspired precisely analogous to the manifestations of so-called modern Spiritualism, and hence its mediums stand in the same relation to the spiritual and physical worlds as stood the prophets, seers and apostles of a elent times.

Resolved that said ancient seers and prophets of this or any previous age, are and were, fallible human beings, who in the exercise of their mediumistic powers, were and are as rapport with human beings like themselves, and to the same natural fallibility on the part of communicated fold, reliability, may be ascribed all that heclouds the lustre of spiritual intercommunication, alike of the past and of the present day.

Resolved that the primary beard ence of Spiritualism is in the demonstration of immortality, which demonstration is the underlying fact of a philosophy of life which grows clearer, broader and more practically important as it is understood and the principles of which it is obeyed.

Resolved that it is not the propagation of a faith but the arousal of latent spiritual energies, the elevation of human aspiration, and the consecrating circles of all human powers that consummates the progress and secures the happiness of humanity; and further, that the existence of an inherent soul possibility guarantees the possession of a soul right, and the possession of a soul right involves the inalienable obligation therefore to need and will labor for that reform of public opinion and statute laws which shall recognize the same standard of right, justice, virtue, responsibility and responsibility for all persons, irrespective of caste, condition, sex, or any other darling sinful peculiarity.

Resolved, that inasmuch as the Spiritualists were among the first to give a universal recognition of the co-equality of woman in all the relations and duties of life, we hereby continue to extend our sympathy and co-operation to any woman's suffrage association, party or league whose policy is based upon the declaration that women citizens of the United States have the right to vote under the Constitution as now established by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

Resolved, that the equality of wages, without regard to sex for like performance, men's our hearty approval, and that we will labor earnestly for a universal recognition of so just a claim.

Resolved that there is need of more liberal, humane and more comprehensive methods for the cure of diseases of the mind; that we recognize the possibility of great good to the human family from therapeutic treatment of the insane, and that all efforts in that direction commend themselves to the hearty support and co-operation of all spiritualists, and persons of liberal thought.

After some debate, this resolution was unanimously adopted, and the following persons were appointed to constitute the board of trustees in connection as they can in regard to it, and report to the Association next year:

Henry T. Child, M. D., Philadelphia; Henry F. Gardner, M. D., Hartford; A. Atwood, M. D., New York; Susan D. Waters, Bordentown; Snohomish Wheeler, Illinois; Andrew Jackson Davis, Orange New Jersey; Dr. Meade of Boston.

Resolved that in the address which comes to us from Utah, we find additional evidences of the power of Spiritualism to free mankind from the thralldom of unjust authority, whether religious, political or social; whether imposed by individuals or institutions from without, or by the tyranny of conscience by a warped and dark-soul intellect from within, and we cordially extend the hand of fraternal greeting to the noble men and women from that region of obstacles, and joyfully recognize them as co-laborers in the great work of human emancipation.

Resolved, that as our national intercourse with the nations has been mainly character ised by deceit, bribery and knavery, and as they have been the prey of corrupt speculators, traders and Indian agents, we reject at all efforts of the Government to inaugurate and adopt a more humane policy, and we urge the duty of self reliance, self help.

Resolved, that the fundamental basis of education is in a system that best tends to draw out the innate powers and energies of the child, and that it should unfold the physical, mental and spiritual departments.

Resolved, that all efforts of any ecclesiastical body to change the organic law of the land, which guarantees religious liberty to all, by the removal of its protecting folds, so as to incorporate in the Constitution of the United States the recognition of the Jewish Jehovah, the dogma of the Trinity, or any other theological notion, should carefully be watched and promptly rebuked, and we especially urge upon all Spiritualists and reformers to care fully criticise all candidates for office, had to give their ballots for such men and women only as are pledged by word and all such efforts.

Resolved, that the further development and future usefulness of Spiritualism requires unity of effort for the analysation of phenomena; the classification of facts and the verification of the sciences of the future by the philosophy of the higher life; in order that the progress of the intellect may ultimate in spiritual fraternity, practical co-operation, and a better life.

Resolved, that it is the duty of all Spiritualists to stand by the faith they profess; to use all the peculiary means they can spare for religious purposes, for the support of the instrumentalities by which Spiritualism is promulgated; and that those who add to the support of the various channels of the neglect of mediums, lecturers and spiritual papers, are unfaithful to their paramount obligations.

Resolved, that Spiritualism tends to purity of thought, holiness of life, and virtuous conduct; and holds all individually responsible for their character and conduct.

Whereas children have a natural right to be healthfully and harmoniously born, therefore

Resolved, that the subject of ante natal conditions and influences, as well as the influences after birth, should be a part of the education of children, and as fully and freely discussed as any other subject, being of the highest importance to the whole human race.

Resolved, that the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the Spiritualist Association of Troy for the kindness and courtesy extended to the delegates.

EVENING SESSION.

The following report we copy from the Troy Daily Whig:

The last session of the Convention began with an address by the newly elected President of the Association, Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull, in which we judge to be of more interest to the generality of our citizens than the other very interesting, and sometimes very remarkable addresses delivered before the Convention, we give the following selections merely the salliest points of a very lengthy speech:

I thank the Troy Times for the opportunity it has given me to say a word to this Convention which has honored me so highly. Aspiration of thought is the beginning of wisdom. Hence I like it. Whatever others may think of it, I know that the social question lies at the base of all reform: it is the great question, and we can't shirk it if we would, and I would not if I could; but our friends of the press cry "Free Love!" But it does n't frighten me a bit, for I have never known any oth er love than free love; they may be married with some other kind. We have laws that give the tie to it, but for all that, sensible people know that it is the law that lies, and not love. I spoke to you yesterday of children. I now add that we can never have perfect children born in Rikelsi conditions, and we might just as well meet this question right here and now, as to delay it, since it must be met sooner or later. I have boldly proclaimed these doctrines, and am ready to defend them. The Times may call them "nastiness," but I call them my religion, and am ready to die for it as were the early martyrs for their religion. If prop er generation is not a good religion to preach, and will you say for regeneration, which is so widely discussed? I tell you, my friends, that they are afraid that their corruption will be gone. If I am asked, do you believe in promiscuous intercourse the sexes, I reply I do not believe in prohibited sexual it. I know that it exists to an alarming extent; and more I know that a great many of those advocates who write me down, are among its best representatives. But if you ask me if I believe in a condition a high one, I will say I think it to be that which the Times calls "continence." I hope it has not view my assertions to be simply colored things. I believe in the highest purity, and that every sentiment of lust for which I condemn. I know that there are all degrees of lust and love, from the lowest to the highest. But I believe the highest sexual relations are those that are monogamic, and that those are high and spiritual in proportion as they are conjugal ones. I preach, and believe that every woman who has purity in her soul, protests against all laws that would compel them to maintain relations with men for whom they have no regard. I honor that purity of life which comes from the heart, while I pity the woman who is pure simply because the law makes her so. If to hold and practice such doctrines as these is to be a deep free lover, then I am a free lover.

I ought before you to declare that my sex are entitled to the inalienable right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. The first two I can not be deprived of except for cause and by due process of law, but upon the last a right is accorded to place restrictions so general as to include the whole of my sex, and for which no reason of public good can be assigned. I ask the right to pursue happiness by having a voice in that government to which I am accountable if there are women who do not desire to have a voice in the laws to which they are accountable, and to which they must contribute to support, let them speak for themselves; but they should not assume to speak for me or for those whom I represent. And others of my sex find ourselves controlled by a form of government in the inauguration of which we had no voice, and the principles involved in which are denied the right to participate, though we are a large part of the people of this country. Was George the Third's rule, which he endeavored to enforce over our fathers, less cleanly an assumed rule than is that to which we are subjected? He exercised it over them without their consent and against their wish and will, and naturally they rebelled. So men of the United States assume and exercise any less authority over women? Not one whit. No; not one whit the less. To be sure his cabinet were few, while they are many; but the principle is the same; in both cases the inherent elemental right to self-government is set down as to "other men," and we are "subject to the laws" they make. Is not Franklin good authority in matters of freedom? Again, in hearing the arguments that have emanated from Congress and applying them to the present, we discern that it is idle to show that in certain instances, the fathers failed to apply the sublime principles which they declared. Their failure can be no apology for those on whom the responsibility rests. Is it to be an apology now? Shall the omission of others to do justice keep the government from measuring it to those who now step out for it? I want to see Congress like Abraham to his king, asked for justice. Will they do it? If we do, until the exigencies of the case compel them?

The formal abolition of slavery created several millions of male enfranchised, who, a portion of the actual people of the country, were not entitled to equal rights with themselves. To get over this difficulty, Congress, in its wisdom, saw it to propose a fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, which passed into law by ratification by the States. Section one, of the fourteenth amendment declares:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State in which they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States."

Chief Justice Taney, in Howard, Rep., 404, thus defines the words people and citizens. The words "people of the United States," and "citizens," are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the sovereign people, and every citizen is one of the people, and a constituent member of this sovereignty.

I have learned that high judicial authority has been invoked to settle this question of law, and that this authority has declared that neither the fourteenth nor fifteenth amendment gave any body the right to vote. I think I give the exact words. I have also learned that the fifteenth amendment gave any one the right to vote. There is no language in either the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment which confers rights not possessed, but I will state what these amendments do say, and if it is not equal to the declaration of the right of all to vote, I confess that my perceptions are at fault, for I can not see the difference. They positively declare—and the negative—"All persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens of the United States," and, mark you, of the State where in they reside. I am a person, one of the sovereign people, a citizen of the United States, and of the State of New York. Does the State of New York enforce any law which abridges my privileges or immunities as a citizen? Is it nothing to be denied the right to vote? What privileges and immunities have I differing from the rights of the most absolute monarch? They are subject to such laws as he sees fit to impose. Am I subject to any laws other than are imposed upon me? It does not appear possible to me that men are conscious of the tyranny in assuming to govern women. It may be mildly exercised, but it is, nevertheless, absolute tyranny. I can have what they will give. Could the veriest slave have less? Therefore, government exercises the power of New York in the face of the fifteenth amendment, to enforce laws which abridge my privileges and immunities, as well as those of every other woman who resides therein, who is responsible, taxed and contributes to the maintenance of the government.

(The want of space prevents us from giving more of the first portion of her speech; but we add a few of her closing remarks:)

I have spoken, as briefly as possible, given what I conceive to be the position which the women's rights party occupies at this time, their prospective power, importance and duties, and the dangers by which this country is threatened, from which they may save it.

If Congress refuses to listen to and grant what women ask, there is but one course left them to pursue. Women have no government. Men have organized a government, and they maintain it, to the utter exclusion of women.

Under such glaring inconsistencies, such unwarrantable tyranny, such unscrupulous despotism, what is there left for women to do but to become the mothers of the future government. We will have our rights. We say no longer by your leave: We have brought, sowed and convinced, but we have failed; and we will not fail.

If the people to govern themselves is so unimportant a matter as men now assert it to be, they could not justify themselves in interfering; if, on the contrary, it is the important thing we conceive it to be, they can but applaud the exercising our right.

We mean treason; we mean secession; and on a thousand times grander scale than was that of the South. We are plotting revolution; we will overturn the whole republic and place a government of rich'ousness in its stead, which shall not only profess to derive its power from the consent of the governed, but shall do so in reality.

In conclusion, permit me again to recur to the importance of following up the advantages we have already gained, by rapid and decisive blows for complete victory. Let us do this through the ballot-box, if possible, but by direct appeals to Congress during the next session. And I again declare it as my candid belief that if women will do one half their duty until Congress meets, they will be compelled to pass such laws as are necessary to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment to the Constitution, one of which is, equal political rights for all citizens.

But should they fail, then for the alternative.

On motion of E. S. Wheeler, the following was adopted:

Whereas, we have lost all hope in existing political parties for the purification of the political atmosphere, and the elevation of state and national governments to true republican principles and usage.

Resolved, That we hereby declare our earnest adherence to its interests, and that we will labor for the election of its very able candidate.

Mrs. Anna M. Middlebrook addressed the meeting.

Moses Hull gave a brief but stirring address, and Mrs. H. F. M. Brown closed as follows:

In these parting words I beg permission to speak of myself. When this Association was organized, I was in the world and my faith in it was still strong. I held firmly to the idea that there is power enough in this association, if rightly applied to post this sin-burdened world out where the sky is clear, and the waters calm. I still believe that by the union of hands, hearts, purses, we may build broad, free, educational and industrial institutions that will alter and educate many homeless and ignorant children; an institution that will be the gateway to the kingdom of heaven.

I joined this Association because I had faith in it. I wanted to work with the workers; wanted to aid in laying the corner stone of humanity's holy temple.

Three years ago I was elected one of the trustees, the only woman on the Board. I took my place, glad enough to work with the strong-handed apostles of good angels. But I hoped other women would join me on the Board. They came—two Friends indeed—followers of George Fox and of the angels.

The past year I have been President of the American Association. I have not done the duty I expected to do; but the means and strength, not the will, have been wanting. Collectively, the members of the Board have worked in faith, hope, and charity, having ever in view the work you have put into our hands.

In my goings and doings as Trustee, Missionary, President, I have been greatly aided and strengthened by the people where my lines have been cast, and by the members of the Board. Justice bids me add that to our Secretary I am under very many obligations; in all emergencies I have turned to him. He has been my sheet-anchor. I want to express to him, as the friend of the Board, and to all who have been ready, with helpful hands and strong words, my grateful remembrance of their blessings.

With this meeting my duties as President end. A faithful worker takes my place. In leaving you I lose none of my faith in your growing society, nor do I leave others to do my individual work. I hope and expect to labor evermore for a cause that lies next my heart.

A German poet said, "Age wants a shelter from the storm, and a well where to fill his pitcher."

I have neared life's front time; the autumn winds already suggest the end of a winter and a well I have cast about and found them in the far southwest, by the Pacific ocean. A few acres surround my cottage. I have planted the grape and fig, and by that warm sunset land shall turn by and by. I shall go enriched with precious memories, and with sweet pic ures of open doors and of generous souls.

May I not hope that soon, many of you who have strewn my way with flowers will visit me under my own vine and fig tree? So that as it may, I shall send you across the continent, by the unsensible boats, my warm heart greeting and my good will. With these sad words—leaving, farewell.

I declare the meeting adjourned till next year at the call of the trustees.

The Finance Committee reported that they had collected $228 10 at meeting, and received $71 for members. Total, $106 10.

MICHIGAN.

Spiritual Mass Meeting at Leoni, Jackson County.

FRIDAY EVENING, SEPT. 23d, 1871.

Met according to previous notice, in Good Templar's Hall, a fair representation of Liberalists from the surrounding towns, for the purpose of having a spiritual feast; in which hope and purpose we were not disappointed, for the meeting throughout was a success, and has evidently left a few visible impressions on the community.

At 7½ o'clock the meeting was called to order by Bro. Pickell, of Leoni, when the nominations and election of officers was consummated as follows: Bro. Taylor, of Leslie, President; Mrs. Vannetty, of Jackson, Vice-President; Dr. Haskell, of Leoni, Secretary—who being unable to attend to that duty, Bro. Taylor of Leslie, was requested to fill that office.

Committee on Business: Bros. Woodworth, of Leslie, Pickell, Smithworth, and Raymond, Mrs. Pickell, of Leoni, and Mrs. Welling, of Jackson.

Order of exercises.—Salutatory welcome by the President, followed with a sweet spirit song from brother and sister Fowler, of Adrian, and a speech through Mrs. Fowler, on "Immortality," and short speeches on the same by Bros. Woodworth and Taylor.

Benedic tion by the President.

Adjourned to 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY—MORNING SESSION.

Opened at 10 o'clock with introductory remarks by the President.

Followed with short speeches from Bros Pickell, Woodworth, Raygood, Taylor, and a lengthy speech on "Bible Superstition," through Sister Fowler.

Bro. Woodworth then gave a short history of his spiritual visions, etc.

Concluding remarks by Bro. Taylor.

Adjourned to 2 o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Opened at 2 o'clock P. M. with an introductory speech by Bro. Taylor.

"Mental and Spiritual Development," by Bro. Woodworth.

"The Co-operation of the Intellectual and Spiritual Forces in the great Labor of Life, at the Present Time," by the President.

Sister Fowler then took the stand in a trance state, and the influence spoke well, and at some length, on the advantages of Spiritual Philosophy to humanity, which was followed by another beautiful song, and a short speech on the neglect of the use of the word "philosophy" by the churches, and the reason why, by Bro. Woodworth.

Adjourned to 7 o'clock in the evening.

EVENING SESSION.

Opened at 7 o'clock with a short speech from the President. Followed by Bro. Woodworth on "Inspiration."

Song by brother and sister Fowler.

Speech by Bro. Bansil, of Hanover, on the new religion, as he called it.

Short speeches by Bros. Taylor, Pickell, Woodworth, and a lengthy one through Sister Fowler, on the passage: "Behold what a great fire a little matter kindleth."

The speech was followed by taking up a contribution.

A few concluding remarks and benediction by the President.

Adjourned to 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SUNDAY MORNING SESSION.

Opened at 9 o'clock with reading a short chapter from the Index.

Speech by the President, which was followed by Bro. Woodworth on "Salvation."

Bro. Pickell on "The Sin against the Holy Ghost," and the theological issues of the day.

Bro. Bansil spoke on the practical issue of the present time, etc.

Sister Price, of Hillsdale, spoke on the beauties of Spiritualism, the another speech by Bro. Bansil on the rules, followed by a beautiful spirit song.

Then came a speech on the "Religion of Psychology," through Sister Fowler.

Closing remarks and benediction by the President.

Adjourned to 2 o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Opened at two o'clock with reading, and a speech on the law of facts as demonstrated in science, as being essential to the highest development of man,—by the President.

Song by Sister Fowler.

Short speech by Sister Price on magnetic influence.

Wordworth gave another short speech on the relation of psychology, followed by Bro. Pickell, Bro. Bansil, and Sister Fowler.

Adjourned to 7 o'clock in the evening.

EVENING SESSION.

Opened at 7 o'clock with a thanks offering or invocation, and eulogy on prayer, by the President.

A short and pithy speech by Bro. Woodworth, and quite a logical speech on infidelity, through Sister Fowler.

Closing remarks by the President.

Thus, like all meetings of the kind, presented a variety of talent, which, taken as a whole, was good, and will average in the display of good feeling, harmony, etc., with any that I have attended in the West. Our friends from abroad were treated with great kindness and hospitality in Leoni, the outsiders throwing open their doors and entertaining brothers and sisters who had come there to participate in the spiritual convocation, for which the presiding Secretary furnish a copy of the proceedings of this meeting for publication in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, which report is herewith sent.

Dr. HASKELL, Secretary.

WISCONSIN.

Genesee Grove Meeting.

The friends of Spiritualism met on the 9th and 10 h of September, in Bro. Norris's grove. The Genesee friends had provided a fine carpeted rostrum and seats, ornamented with a table richly laden with rare fruits and flowers, and a fine organ and choir to discourse sweet music to this gathering of friends.

At an early hour on Saturday, E. W. Stevens called the meeting to order.

H. B. Pitts Ellis was chosen Chairman; Augusta Loomis, Secretary; Ira A. White, Almay Patterson and Marcia A. Webb were appointed by the Chair as a Finance Committee, and the three speakers, Dr. J. H. Severance, E. W. Stevens, and J. O. Barrett, as Committee on Programme.

The remainder of the morning session was devoted to conference. Words of congratulation, encouragement, and mutual instruction were the interchange of soul with soul. This cordial greeting, harmony, and unanimity of the opening session continued to the end of the meeting.

A bountiful repast was served up for dinner in picnic manner, and for two hours the social pleasure was enjoyed by all, under the blue sky and waving branches. The pleasure of the occasion was much enhanced by the Messrs. Severance, of Milwaukee, who discoursed sweet music during intermission.

SATURDAY—AFTERNOON SESSION.

At 2½ o'clock P. M., Bro. E. W. Stevens gave a lecture on "Inspiration," full of new and startling thought,—showing up the false notions and superstitious myths concerning the subject, that have so long bided the world.

He followed in illustration of the various kinds and qualities of inspiration, with their causes and effects, closing with "The Inspiration of the Angels" in his own inspired manner.

He was followed by Mrs. Severance, recommending a higher degree of culture as a means of increasing the power and influence of Spiritualism; and Magnetism as an agent in the restoration of criminals, and in the progress of mankind.

EVENING SESSION.

The evening session was held in the large school-house. Three half-hour lectures were given by the three speakers, on the subject of "Mediumship," after which an interesting conference was held.

SUNDAY MORNING SESSION.

Opened by A. B. Severance on "The uses of Psychometry" and its power as a developing agent in society. By request he gave his views on capital punishment, showing it up as the relic of a barbarous age, that should pass away forever.

Bro. J. O. Barrett gave the lecture of the forenoon. He began by expressing the conviction that Spiritualists at their present states were unprepared for organization, and urged the necessity of getting the inner life in right condition as a means of preparation.

He brought conclusive evidence of the ability of spirits to commune with spirits, whether in or out of the body, and urged the importance of having a room in every home consecrated to spirit influence and sacred uses, where the soul can commune with the departed, and where the spirit leaving the body, may be surrounded by conditions that shall make its transit from earth to spirit life easy, pleasant and tranquil.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The lecture by Mrs. Dr. Severance on "The Needs of the Hour," was a fine effort. She noted the progress of the world from the earliest Bible times to the present. She showed that men's ideas of God responded with their stage of development, and that every new idea has been met by opposition and persecution; that the Christ principles in the days of the Nazarene were opposed, as Spiritualism is now; that organizations are adapted to the status of mankind; that at the present day liberal ideas like magnetism, permeate all departments of literature, and the minds of the people; that political progress in all eras of the world's history corresponds to its religious development. She closed with a few pertinent remarks on equal rights and universal suffrage, leaving a fine impress on the minds of her large audience.

The meeting closed by an ecstatic conference at the schoolhouse. As a whole, it was the best meeting of the kind we ever attended. The dignified and affable manner of our honored Chairman, the hospitality of the Genesee friends, the beautiful weather, the sublime, eloquent, and inspired course of lectures, gave the happiest satisfaction, and we believe all were much better for having attended this meeting. May such seasons often be repeated.

AUGUSTA LOOMIS, Secretary.

Letter from Austin Kent.

BROTHER JONES:—I am tired and sorry to beg so much; yet I have taken the pen to ask the favor of saying to your readers, that I have over three hundred copies of a work which is admitted to be the strongest and deepest work on the radical side of the controversy, in question ever issued from the American press. It interests (and I am desirous that it should be read by) all old and strong thinkers and deep researchers, who are out and out friends to free discussion. I will send it freely to those who have gold me, what I know their desire for it. If others who believe they would prize it will send me 75 or 80 cents for it, they will greatly oblige. Write your address plainly and fully. Address: Austin Kent, Box 64, Southboro, New York.

REMARKS:—We hope our friends every where will patronize Bro. Kent. He is worthy of your sympathy. By purchasing the book, you will aid him and benefit yourselves.

Shooting among Spiritualists.

CHICAGO, SEPT. 18.—About 10 o'clock last night, just as a number of Spiritualists who had been holding a meeting at No. 145 South Halsted street, were about to go to their homes in this earthly sphere, a medium named Carrie M. Sawyer and one Mitchell, her affinity, were shot by Mr. Baker, the former husband of the medium in question. The spirits not volunteering to extract the bullets, physicians were called in. The bewitching Carrie was not much hurt, but Mitchell is in a critical condition. Baker is still at large.

We clip the above from the St. Paul Pioneer, of Tuesday, 8 p. 19th, 1871. The actors in this tragedy are Spiritualists, and that is sufficient reason for the papers to keep it before the public and to carefully point out the fact that "the parties were Spiritualists."

Now, we can point out the Ticknors, the Guinbys, and Rev. Hart L. Stewart, who are equally guilty of all charged against Carrie M. Sawyer, Mr. Mitchell, or the fool-hardy Baker mentioned above. We take one case from a large list of defaulting Christians we have in our possession, and give it with the above to our readers:

INCEST, FREE LUSTS AND BESTIALITY AMONG THE FREEWILL BAPTISTS.

One Peter Pettis, living in Baldwin, Sherman county, Minnesota, has a wife and family, all members of the Freewill Baptist Church, and in good standing at the time the expose was made.

Laurie Pettis daughter of Peter Pettis, had a beau, one Joshua Judkins. The father urged up the marriage of the young couple. It took place.

Five months and ten days after the marriage of Joshua and Laurie, Laurie gave birth to a full-grown child. Joshua not liking such an early addition to his family, charged his young and pious wife with infidelity to her liege lord and pious master,—for, be it remembered, Joshua was also of the Freewill Baptist faith. But this freewill offering of the young wife was a little too much for the free and easy will of Joshua.

The wife acknowledged the infidelity, and agreed to go before the proper authorities and make a clean breast of the whole affair. Laurie and Joshua accordingly came before H. M. Atkins, Esq., Notary Public, and swore that her father, Peter Pettis, was the father of her child, and further testified that her father had cohabited with her since she was ten years of age, and also since her marriage to J shua Judkins; that he frequently told her that she must not compl in of him, or tell any one of this matter, that if she did, she would send him to the state prison; that the expose and disgrace would make her mother crazy and send her to the insane asylum; that she, the daughter, would be disgraced in the eyes of the people and become an outcast.

After this fearful confession, this pious household was compromised the matter,—the pious father giving the pi us son and daughter his property, as "hush money," after which,—that is, after assigning to Joshua and Laurie his house and most of his personal effects,—he, Peter, went and sold a good part of the personal property and pocketed the money, thus adding theft to the crime of secret seduction of his own daughter, and adultery with his son-in-law's wife—his own child.

This man, Peter Pettis—pious Freewill Baptist man—could not find language that would properly express his contempt and loathing for Spiritualism and its "free love tendencies."

We prefer Carrie Sawyer and Mitchell with their "Spiritual shooting" to this old incarnate free-luster under the influence of the holy spirit.

Will the St. Paul Pioneer copy this Freewill Baptist article? We shall see. We herewith send the St Paul Pioneer a copy of our paper, so that there may be no excuse for not publishing the short-comings of the Minnesota Freewill Baptists.

H. M. Atkins, Esq., is a Notary Public for Princeton, Mille Lacs county, State of Minnesota.

Women in Heaven!—A Wonder.

An English preacher we are told, declares, as observing authority, that there are twelve times as many women in Heaven as men, and, by a parity of reasoning, there must be twelve times as many men as women in the other place not to be mentioned to ears polite. How the Reverend Briton got his information, or why he fixed upon the proportion of twelve to one, instead of twenty to one, we are not informed, but it adds a new horror to the lower hot settlements to know that when pain and anguish wring the brow there, the ministering will be scarce. We do not like to joke on serious subjects, and we promise not to, when addle-pated conjecturers will let them alone.

We clip the above statement from the New York Tribune of August 23, 1871. Surely there is something new under the sun. Twelve women to one man in Heaven. Whose husband shall he be?

Readers, what would the orthodox world say if Wilson, Wheeler, Wheelock, or White, had spoken the above sentiment? Would not the Christian world have hissed fairly? Yes verily, they would hiss.

We do hope that our brothers, whose names begin with a W, will not be offended at the liberty we have taken with their sacred names, and call on the societies before whom they have spoken to defend them from an attack.

We are getting more careful of late, we are.

Tax the Cats and Birds.

The following item we take from an eastern paper. It speaks for itself:

We begin to think that there is nothing in this world which may not be subjected to a tax through the exigencies of an insolvent government. One of the latest financial schemes in Paris is a tax of five francs each on cats, every cat, and of one franc on each bird kept in a cage. Considering that these creatures are the special domestic favorites of lone and single women of an uncertain age, we can not help seeing in this new extortion positive evidence that the tender chivalry so often attributed to Frenchmen is no more than a melancholy myth. Thank Fortune, we have'nt come to cats and canary birds yet!

"Thank Fortune, we have'nt come to cats and canary birds yet!" No, but the young men of Chicago's prostitution in our country have called to have the law so amended, that we shall be obliged to take "God, and his Christ" Constitutionally, and that amendment will require a tax, and as about everything else in our country is already taxed, to pay for the divine institution of Slavery, we may have to tax canary birds to get rid of this proposed divine (?) amendment. Beware! beware!! beware!!! of any politico-religious tinkering with our Constitutional liberties.

Forewarned, Forearmed — Signs of the Times.

Four times within two years the Catholic element has undertaken to crush out free speech. The first time in Quincy, Ill., the second in Pennsylvania, the third in New York city, the last time in Ogdensburgh, N. Y. Our Protestant brethren thereat raise a howl worthy of the days of Gregory IX, and yet they are ready to mob Spiritualism at sight. Christians, "judge not lest ye be judged."

Read the following from a New York paper:

Free speech in Ogdensburg, which has been outraged by a mob seeking to prevent the Baron de Camin from delivering a lecture on Auricular Confession and Popery, has been vindicated by the entirely citizens of the place. The Baron delivered his lecture on Friday afternoon in the Skating Rink, under the protection of the Mayor and the police.

To Keep Our Breeches up.

We clip the following from a late number of the New York Tribune. It is too good to be lost:

It was reserved for this age, we believe, to find out how exceedingly droll children can sometimes be; and we believe that Mr. Clarke, formerly of the Knickerbocker magazine may be regarded as the great discoverer of juvenile wit and wisdom. In the palmy days of his Editor's Table, he would have been delighted to save up this toothsome story of an Iowa youngster, who, being asked by his Sunday school teacher, "Why are we commanded to gird our loins?" instantly answered, "To keep our breeches up!" It would not be surprising if this lad should turn out in time an eminent Bible commentator.

That Iowa boy will make a good bishop. But will he keep his breeches up when a bishop?

TESTIMONIAL.

Mrs. Robinson's Tobacco Antidote.

One box of Mrs. A. H. Robinson's Tobacco Antidote cured me from the use of tobacco, and I heartily recommend it to any and all who desire to be cured. Thank God I am now free, after using the weed over thirty years.

LORENZO MERKER.

Oswego, N. Y., Oct. 21, 1871.

I hereby certify that I have used tobacco over twenty years. One box of Mrs. A. H. Robinson's Tobacco Antidote has effectually destroyed my appetite or desire for tobacco.

DAVID O'HARRA.

Oswego, N. Y., Sept. 18 h, 1871.

I have used tobacco between fourteen and fifteen years. About two months since, I procured a box of Mrs. A. H. Robinson's Tobacco Antidote. It has cured me, and I feel perfectly free from its use. Have no desire for it.

F. H. SPARKS.

Oswego, N. Y., Sept. 25h, 1871.

I have used tobacco, both chewing and smoking, about twelve years. One box of Mrs. A. H Robinson's Antidote has cured me and left me free, with no desire or hankering for it.

GEORGE A. BARKER.

Oswego, N. Y., Oct. 2 1, 1871.

A Mr. R. T. Wyman, of Wankau, informs me he has used one box of Tobacco Antidote. Will you for inclosed $2.00 send me a package.

Miss Downing's Home School.

In another column will be found an advertisement of Miss Downing's School, at South Hampton Hill, New Hampshire, near the seaboard.

We most cheerfully recommend this school to all our friends who have daughters to educate. The location is healthy and very pleasant—teachers not excelled at any similar institution. Send to Miss Downing for circulars. Address as directed in the advertisement.

☞ Please preserve this paper for future reference, and to show to others.

Those who wish to have this paper discontinued when the time is up to which it is paid for, should notify us of that wish two weeks before such time expires, as it takes that time to get it out of the mailing machine. When an order to discontinue is given by those in arrears, remittances should be made to square up in full, including the two weeks which the paper will be mailed the subscriber after such notice is given Testimonial for a Healing Medium.

This is to certify that two months ago I applied to Mrs. A. H. Robinson for treatment. At that time I was perfectly paralyzed with rheumatism and general debility. I had not been able to work for four months, had spent considerable money with eminent physicians, and was getting weaker every day. Mrs. Robinson sent a diagnosis of my case, and a prescription, which I followed. I had not worn the positive papers which she sent me by letter, one half hour until I felt that there was virtue in them, and that I would be benefited by them. I have followed her advice as near as I could, and to-day finds me able to do a fair day's work without being very tired.

I would say to the afflicted, with whatever malady, apply to Mrs. A. H. Robinson, the medium, 142 6-8 avenue, Chicago, for relief.

I shall always feel grateful to her, and recommend her on all occasions.

THE BHAGVAT-GEETA,

Or Dialogues of

KREESHNA AND ARJOON.

In eighteen lectures, with notes. Translated from the original Sanskrit, or ancient language of the Brahmins.

BY CHARLES WILKINS,

Senior merchant in the service of the Honorable, the East India Company, in their Bengal Establishment.

The antiquity of the original and the veneration in which it has been held for so many ages by a very considerable portion of the human race, renders it one of the greatest curiosities ever presented to the literary world.

Our edition of the BHAGVAT-GEETA (sometimes called the Hindoo New Testament) is printed on heavy tinted paper and beautifully bound. It is in great demand, orders for nearly all of the first edition having been received before it left the binder's hands.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS. R. B GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had in its class. It is written for women; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need satisfaction. It is safe book for young people and for the body indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:

"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cures, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

Price, $1 50; postage, 16 cents. Address RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 S. Clark street, Chicago.

DYSPEPSIA OR INDIGESTION, Headache, Pain in the Shoulders, Cough, Tightness of the Chest, Dizziness, Sour Eructations of the Stomach, Bad Taste in the Mouth, Bilious Attacks, Palpitation of the Heart, Inflammation of the Lungs, Pain in the Region of the Kidneys, and a hundred other painful symptoms are the offsprings of Dyspepsia. One bottle will convince the most incredulous of their curative effects.

FOR SKIN DISEASES, Eruptions, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Blotches, Spots, Pimples, Pustules, Boils, Carbuncles, Ring-worms, Scald-head, Sore Eyes, Erysipelas, Itch, Discolorations of the Skin, Humors, these Bitters have no equal. In fact they have proved their great curative power in the most obstinate and intractable cases.

FOR PURIFYING, CLEANSING AND ENRICHING the Blood, Liver, Lungs, Stomach, Bowels, Kidneys, Bladder and Nervous System, they have no equal. They are the best Blood Purifier and Life Giving Principle yet discovered, and no person can take these Bitters according to the directions for any length of time, and remain unwell, provided their bones have not been destroyed by mineral poison or other means, and vital organs wasted beyond the point of repair.

Dr. Walker's California Vinegar Bitters are not a vile fancy drink, made of cheap rot-gut whiskey, high wines, and poisonous drugs, to please the taste, and stupify the patient, but a medicine of the most exquisite curative properties, warranted to cure all diseases named in the circular, or no pay required. Do not suffer yourself or friends to be imposed upon by worthless stuff, but use the best and purest medicine ever made.

Religio-Philosophical Journal.

CHICAGO, OCT. 19, 1871.

No. 6. S. S. JONES, Editor and Proprietor. Vol. XI.

To the Readers of the Journal.

DEAR READERS:—

But ten days since our city was enveloped in flames. Immediately after our Publishing House was burned, and while the conflagration was yet raging, we issued a miniature edition announcing our intention to reinstate our Publishing House and resume the publication of the JOURNAL at the earliest moment possible—at the same time appealing to our friends in the strongest manner to render us such pecuniary aid as justice demanded from those who are indebted to us for papers already received. And not only to that class did we present our earnest appeal for aid, but we felt at liberty, under the crushing calamity that had so overwhelmed us, to ask all readers of the JOURNAL to promptly renew their subscriptions for another year; aye, we asked for temporary loans of convenient sums for immediate relief, under the positive assurance that every dollar so furnished us should be promptly paid with interest, at such times as the friend making the loan should fix; pledging our sacred honor that all obligations thus contracted should be promptly paid.

The appeal then made we now renew, and if possible to assign a more potent reason therefor, it would be the fact that all we then promised to be done on our part has been entered upon with all the energy of our nature.

Our first business was to find new quarters for our Publishing House in the new business centre of Chicago. That being found quite commodious, at No. 148 West Washington Street, we next turned our face toward New York for supplies. We reached that city on Saturday evening, Oct. 14th, through the kindness of Mr. Cleland, Gen'l Sup't of Pittsburg and Fort Wayne and Penna. Central R. R. Co.'s, in presenting us with a free pass—for it must be remembered that money is very scarce in Chicago, and but for his or some other person's kindness we might not have been able thus speedily to have performed the journey.

On arriving in New York we sought for and found an especial friend, not a spiritualist—(we hope he may be some day.) He promptly placed one thousand dollars at our disposal. The next day, Sunday, we met Brother Paul Bremond of Houston, Texas, who, in the goodness of his heart, on shaking hands with us, left a one-hundred-dollar bank note sticking to our palm. We accepted it with gratitude, but only on condition that it should be considered as a loan, to be fully paid, at the earliest possible moment after we are fully "reconstructed," from legitimate receipts for subscriptions now past due, and new ones in advance. Several other gentlemen and ladies cordially met us, and at the Sunday lectures in New York made us glad by new subscribers, renewals and payments of arrearages. These assurances of energetic action to obtain new subscriptions made us feel that we were truly among friends.

On Monday morning our first business was to visit the type-foundries, in view of purchasing supplies for refitting our PUBLISHING HOUSE.

How to approach these men was the question. How were we to interest them in the wants of a burnt-out spiritualist, one who had but little money, and that borrowed? "A bold front" was necessary; and never being ashamed to confess that we are a spiritualist, we introduced ourself as the editor and proprietor of the little sheet that was published during the conflagration, four by six inches square. We told them we had many thousand dollars due us for subscriptions to that paper; that honest men and women owed us money enough to pay for a new outfit; and that if they were honest, as we supposed they were, when we were sending the paper to them, they would now, in this our hour of trial, pay us every dollar due us, and renew for a year longer, paying us three dollars or more to help us make a better paper than we have ever published.

These men looked at us, and at the little paper, as much as to say, Do you call that a newspaper? We understood that an explanation was needed at that point. We made it. Again, these business men seemed to indicate that subscribers who allowed their bills to run behind were doubtful—in some cases, at least. We again took the hint, and explained that it was all right—they were spiritualists, and that it was now fortunate that we had so much due us—the debtors being poor but honest spiritualists, would make a desperate effort, and by that means would easily raise the money and help us out of our difficulty promptly.

Strange as it may seem, the argument was potent, and its effect was all that was desired. We purchased on credit! yes, on credit! and we pledged the integrity of every subscriber to the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL that the debt should be honorably and promptly paid.

We ask you, brothers and sisters, to stand by this pledge. It was made in the name of Spiritualism. It was made by one who never yet violated a pledge of honor!

But it is a pledge that must be backed, to be maintained, by those whose duty, and whose sympathy may be awakened! We have an abiding confidence that every subscriber will be willing to do the fair thing in re-establishing the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, and the reissue of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

We ask for nothing but justice and that sympathy that is potent to every feeling soul towards his fellow-man under similar circumstances. We ask not for a single dollar as a matter of charity. We will return dollar for dollar with interest.

We will give you a handsomer and a better paper than we have ever before been able to furnish.

Our stock, entirely new, is of the most perfect kind, and we feel confident of being able to get our Publishing House reconstructed, and our paper out within the next ten days.

We will do our part faithfully; night and day will we work to place before you a new and well-spread table of the richest viands—aye, mental and spiritual food. Again we ask you to aid us promptly.

To our correspondents and friends we appeal, and say that our "MSS" was all consumed; let us hear from you, as you may be inspired to write. Any interesting items or other matter that you may be in possession of will be acceptable.

FIRE! FIRE!!

The element of fire is pure: it burns as brightly in the cot of the peasant as in the palace of the king.

The 9th and 10th days of October, 1871, will be memorable days in the history of the world. The fire fiend held high carnival over the beautiful city of Chicago, and, though we were eight hundred miles away, the echoing notes of the groans and shrieks of terrified, suffering and dying human beings came to us over the telegraph lines of sympathy even more rapidly than the flashing lightning told of the fearful destruction. It was not the same as in the battle hours of the rebellion, when heart throbs beat loud and painfully, and yet there was something akin to it, and we felt that grand and heroic deeds were being acted that the recording angels above alone would keep.

On and on the fire fiend rolled, and as it licked up alike the cot and the palace, it seemed to mock at the puny arm of man. These terrible shocks to humanity are full of deep meaning.

They are profound lessons, which all should study.

When our Nation's heart was struck dumb, and almost paralyzed by the brutal assassination of Abraham Lincoln, how we looked into each others' faces, and drew closer together in the contemplation of the horrible deed.

Out in the country, away from city life and customs, if two persons meet, there is recognition, an interchange of thought, and a feeling that we belong to a common humanity. So, when such a fearful catastrophe rends the heart of humanity, the cold formalities of city life are for the time laid aside, the heart speaks, and man greets his fellowman in a common interest.

The most redeeming trait of the late war was the philanthropic movement of the Sanitary and Christian Commissions, for the relief of the suffering ones. It was the highest thing that poor humanity, with its war spirit still alive, could do, first maim men and then do all they could to relieve them. We look for the coming of a better time, when such commissions shall not be needed.

To-day the philanthropy of the world has been awakened by this terrible devastation and loss of life and property as it never was before; money and provisions and clothing have been given freely for these suffering ones, and, as it is always "more blessed to give than to receive," the world is being abundantly blessed.

Those who know of the thrift and energy of our people, and especially of this, the most wonderful of all cities, know that such a calamity will only fire anew the ardor and enthusiasm of the enterprising citizens of this great metropolis of the West or rather centre of our country.

Already business has revived and in a few months this will be greatly extended, and in a very few years this city, that now lies smouldering in ruins, will rise, phœnix-like, and be seen again in queenly beauty. Our readers are aware that the office of the Journal, with almost all its contents, was swallowed up by the devouring element.

We are glad to know that the appeal of Brother Jones for assistance has been so promptly responded to, especially in the effort to obtain new subscribers.

We repeat the suggestion, that each one of the present subscribers should resolve to obtain at least one new one, and as many more as they can, and would also propose, that those who feel able, should subscribe at once for an additional copy of the paper, to hand to some one who will read it. This is not a matter of charity, for each one who subscribes gets the worth of their money. Indeed, we know of no better way of investing small sums of money, than in circulating our books and papers, which are silent, but powerful messengers of the living Gospel to the people wherever they go.

BROTHER JONES.

We were highly gratified to see him at our office in Philadelphia, on the evening of October 18th, on his return from New York.

Never before have we seen him so calm and collected; manifesting the coolest and most heroic determination to bring order out of chaos at once, and have our JOURNAL again before the world in a very few days.

He estimates his loss at about ten thousand dollars, on which there are insurances of no value; but as you will see by his editorial in this number, and hastily written in our office, all will be right very soon.

We think if the spiritualists do the best they can, we shall have a list of forty thousand subscribers in less than a month from the day of the fire. To do this, each subscriber must obtain at least two new ones. We have pledged ourselves for a hundred, and if our friends will aid us we could easily make it five hundred.

Send on your subscriptions at once, either to the Central Office, No. 148 West Washington Street, Chicago, or to our address, 634 Race Street, Philadelphia, and we will gladly forward them.

We must be in earnest now.

This is the time to work in the East. Not only has Chicago been devastated by fire, but large sections of our country have been laid desolate by the same devouring element. Our subscribers and friends in those sections can do nothing now. Let us be in earnest then!

A QUAKER hearing a man expressing very loud sympathy for one in distress, asked him quaintly, "Did thee feel in thy pocket for him?"

CHICAGO AND HER DESTINY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal.

Great even in the horrors of her recent conflagration!

For a night and a day even the stoutest hearts quailed at the fearful loss of property, and the more terrible loss of life and human suffering.

An hundred thousand human souls driven from their homes and every comfort of life destroyed! Two hundred and fifty millions of dollars worth of property destroyed! No pencil can paint, no pen can write, and no tongue can depict the horrors of those terrible hours.

It will be a theme for conversation for centuries to come. The aged grandsires and grandmothers, now little boys and girls, will tell the tale to their great grandchildren, and they will listen with awe-stricken horror to the truthful tale as it shall be recounted eighty years hence by those who were eye-witnesses of the unparalleled devastation.

Chicago—unparalleled in life and vigor—unparalleled in the devastation of life and property—unparalleled in recuperative powers—unparalleled in ability to bring order out of chaos. But eighteen days have elapsed, at this writing, since a sea of flames enveloped the heart of this city, and nearly five square miles of solid buildings, one-third of which were palatial structures, were swept out of existence.

The terrible conflagration, with its attendant horrors, aroused the sympathy of the civilized world. Every means of conveyance was brought into immediate use, and freighted with the necessaries of life for the homeless and destitute. A more noble example of the innate goodness of human nature was never manifested.

Man "totally depraved!" The sentiment is an abominable lie. The manifestation of the holiest feelings known, towards the sufferers of Chicago, by all classes of people, is evidence that the germ of goodness is found in every human soul, and only needs proper conditions to cause it to germinate and bring forth fruit.

The noble impulse of the world towards poor, suffering Chicago, has inspired every one of her sons and daughters with new zeal and courage. The waste places already show signs of speedy reconstruction. Scarcely a place remains intact as the flames left it.

The streets are all cleared of their rubbish. The fallen debris is being carefully assorted, and all that is valuable for rebuilding (brick, stone and iron) is being carted out and placed in proper condition to be re-used in building.

All over the burnt district new structures are being erected. Some are permanent and good—of brick, stone and iron—others are temporary, for immediate business purposes, while others are workshops and shelters to the many thousands of busy mechanics, who have come up from abroad to aid in the great and noble work of rebuilding the city of Chicago.

Our population is made up from the blood of all nations. In this the hour of these terrible trials they are not forgotten by their countrymen and relatives. From all quarters capital is flowing in, not only to relieve sufferers by free donations, but capital is seeking investment among known friends and business men to rebuild the city.

We have no hesitancy in saying that such a scene of desolation was never presented to the human eye as Chicago presented the day after the fire. No such scene of life and activity among ruins was ever seen as Chicago to-day presents.

Work will be continued throughout the winter. Every able-bodied man who may come here for work, will find employment at good wages. Our beloved city will be rebuilt with a rapidity only equaled by the activity of the element that destroyed it.

THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL will appear in full size at the earliest possible moment. We stated in our last miniature edition, that we had purchased an entire new outfit for our Publishing House, and that the same had been shipped to this city. Every day since, we have been anxiously awaiting its arrival, but as yet, not a single box has come to hand. Transportation companies are taxed to their utmost capacity, and immense piles—hundreds of thousands of tons of goods are piled up awaiting their turn for shipment. We shall continue to look for them until they arrive, and then we shall make all possible haste to arrange our Publishing House and issue the JOURNAL in regular size. We confess our impatience, but, nevertheless, our philosophy tells us to bide our time, and not to look for mechanical impossibilities. It will be but a few days at farthest before we shall be fully under way in publishing our regular weekly editions of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

To those who have already so kindly responded to our urgent calls for relief, we tender our heartfelt and unfeigned thanks. Gratitude, we believe, is a dominant element in our nature. The many who have written, promising renewed efforts to aid us by procuring new, advance paying subscribers, are entitled to and do receive our most cordial thanks. Others who have sent us remittances to aid in sending the JOURNAL to the poor, have worked in the right line. While we do not ask nor receive one dollar as a charity or donation, yet, every dollar invested in a subscription to our paper, for some poor person or friend (and there are multitudes of them), aids us very much at this time, and, at the same time is a means of breaking the bread of life to those who would mentally starve but for such charity. While the world is sending bread to the destitute of our city, will not our friends exert, and every one send, three dollars for mental food for some starving soul within his or her knowledge? We urgently appeal for this kind of aid. It benefits us and it benefits those who will call you blessed. Aye, it will make many souls rejoice—mortal and immortal souls. Angels will look upon such deeds with smiles of approval and tears of sympathy.

If our friends would but realize the anxiety that their spirit friends have in the promulgation of the faith in spirit communion, each and every one would redouble their efforts to circulate the journals devoted to spirit-communion.

To the very many who are yet indebted to us for arrearages, we look for speedy responses. It is that class to whom we must look for immediate and speedy relief. Even-handed justice will prompt every one who owes us, to raise it at all hazards. All that is required, is a will to deal by us as they would wish to be dealt by, if they were victims of a similar calamity. We ask no one to steal to get money to pay us just dues, but we do ask them to use every honorable means to accomplish the object. Not a subscriber, thus situated, will fail to borrow sufficient to cancel such indebtedness, if he or she tells the facts in regards to the use to which the money is to be appropriated.

To that class we do most emphatically appeal; not a day should pass without the remistances being made. We have given credit freely, when our means would admit. Now is the hour of trial with us, and we in turn simply ask that which the world awards as right and just.

Spiritualists, Liberalists, Free-thinkers throughout the world, to you we look for that support which shall enable us to send forth, broadcast, liberal thoughts, based upon the philosophy of life, which are all-potent in banishing the errors and superstitions of an old and effete system of theology. We trust that we shall not look in vain.

Watchman, What of the Night?

The vast tidal wave of feeling that has swept over the great sea of humanity within the past month, has been fraught with lessons of the most profound interest to all mankind, and especially to the philosopher and student, who would look beneath the surface of things to the grand causes that are operating there.

Our brethren on the other Continent have been using the term Solidarity, which Louis Kossuth introduced, and although scholars object to it as a bad word, it seems to us more expressive than our popular term, the Masses, because it means the unity of the race—the oneness of the great mass of humanity.

Mankind are one, more essentially to-day than ever before. The arteries of commerce have sent the life-blood all over the globe, and the nerves of the telegraph have given us power to feel for each other.

There are no strangers on this little ball of earth. There is not an island in the far-off oceans but holds some throbbing human heart that beats in sympathy with all mankind. From the highest to the lowest, from the most cultivated and enlightened nations to the lowest and most ignorant, this bond of union extends.

The external means to which we have referred are not all. Commerce, with its white wings and its steam; the glorious telegraph, with its flashing lightnings, do their work; but "there is a power behind the throne greater than the throne." Spiritualism has revealed and is revealing to us the fact that over and around all nations there are bands of spirits closely allied to these in interests and destiny, and that these great national bands are not isolated as they were in former times, when "Lands separated by a narrow frith abhorred each other."

To-day these national councils, great and small, of spirits, mingle much more freely than earth's children do, and they are seeking to bind all nations and peoples together, and make us one, by showing us that we have common interests and a common destiny. As the facilities for travel on earth have greatly extended the bonds of brotherhood, so in spirit-life, where the freedom of travel is much greater, the opportunities to do this are correspondingly increased, and with the more general mingling with each other, and interchange of thoughts and feelings there is a much better understanding existing.

In the recent wide-spread calamities, more terrible than anything of the like character that has ever fallen upon humanity, we have witnessed a more universal outburst of sympathy and practical benevolence, than has ever been seen on this globe. Humanity, standing on a higher plane, has taken a grander step, leading it to a diviner position: the blessings conferred and the obligations sustained, have bound together the human family more firmly and enduringly than ever before.

Those agonizing heart throes have sent a ripple over the great ocean of humanity, which will carry healing and blessings to all nations. In the light of such a scene, the littleness of selfishness and the narrowness of bigotry are for the time lost sight of, and only the better nature of man speaks. Man realizes something better than he had known in the past. A feeling has come to humanity that never can be lost; they may fall back into the old ruts, but the divine draught which they have taken will never permit them to sink so deeply again.

Every holy sympathy that is awakened, every divine impulse that sweeps across the human soul and draws out its native harmony, lifts man into a higher condition.

It is not the giving of external goods (although the obligation rests upon all who can, to do this), it is the feeling of kindly sympathy that really blesses both giver and receiver, and that all may and do give whose souls are touched with a divine impulse.

Chicago will rise again, phœnix-like, and in her resurrection will have the blessings of the civilized world, and millions of human beings who may never have heard of this city and who may not know a single inhabitant of it, will feel a live interest in its welfare.

Upon the citizens of this great metropolis rests an added responsibility which they can only fulfill by remembering the words of the blessed Jesus: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, ye did it unto me."

AN INVOCATION.

By Mrs. N. J. T. Brigham, delivered at Harmonial Hall, Philadelphia, and reported for the JOURNAL by Henry T. Child, M. D.:

Our Father and our God! Thou in whose hands we are forever! Thou whose spirit is our breath and life. We are grateful for the light that Thou hast given us. Thou art the Infinite and we are the finite, and as all plants grow upward, climbing towards the brighter light, and as the vines cling to that which constitutes their support, so do we grow upward, upward to Thy light, and pray ever to Thy beautiful and perfect nature to sustain us. When our spirits are disappointed; when we have trusted in our own plans and they have failed us; when those upon whom we have looked as the very emblems of earthly excellence prove to us how vain are these expectations; then, oh Father, we can turn to Thee and find that Thou hast never disappointed us. For though in the grand working of Thy law of compensation, the results may come slowly to us, yet they are eternally sure. Not to-day may we see the realization of our brilliant expectations; not to-day may come the fulfillment of all the prophecies of the angels, but it comes to us gradually, as the spring-time comes, and we find at last that all we have deserved we shall surely receive. We find at last that after disappointments, that after griefs and countless troubles in this earth-life, there comes to us a beautiful manifestation of Thy loving mercy and enduring kindness. So, oh Father, we can trust Thee. Whatever comes, we can, in the weariness and weakness of our natures, lay back upon Thy Divine arm, and be rested with the magnetic life and love that flows to us from Thee. So teach us to trust in Thee when our faith grows weak; teach us to look to Thee when disappointments gather around us, so that we may always feel that we are overshadowed by Thy love evermore.

The Food of the Ancients.

Not one of us but has felt curiosity about the food of the ancients. Diodorus Siculus says that the first men ranged over the fields and woods in search of food, like the beasts, eating every wild herb they could find and such fruit as the trees produced. An ancient writer affirms that the diet of the primeval race differed according to the productions of their respective countries; the Arcadians having lived on acorns, the Argives on pears, the Athenians on figs, &c. Plutarch relates that the Argives, led by Inachus, searched the woods for wild pears to support them. Pliny laments the savage condition of the first ages, "which subsisted on acorns." Galen not only thinks these accounts are true, but he tells us that "acorns afford as good nourishment as many sorts of grain; that in ancient times men lived on acorns alone, and that the Arcadians continued to eat them, long after the rest of Greece had made use of bread-corn."

Herodotus relates that upon the death of Lycurgus, the Lacedæmonians, meditating the conquest of Arcadia, were told by the oracle that there were among them the best acorn-eaters, who would repel them, in case they attempted to carry their arms thither, as afterwards happened. Is it not strange with what perverse hallucination philosophers and poets have ever spoken of those periods in the history of the race as the "golden ages"? At length, by what steps we cannot know, agriculture, doubtless in simplest, rudest forms, began. Hesiodus ascribes this invention to Ceres, and admonishes the husbandman to pray to Jupiter and to her before he enters upon his labors. Pliny attributes still further the invention of the plow, grinding corn and making bread, to Ceres, and adds that "Divine honors were paid her in Attica, Italy and Sicily, on this account." At length, as the wonderful story goes, the Creator gave man permission to eat the bodies of animals. This is said to have been given first to Noah, in the following words:

"Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things." And, immediately, another addition was made to man's stomach indulgence. "Noah began to be a husbandman, and he planted a vineyard, and he drank of the wine, and was drunken." Of course he did not permit his family to indulge in wine until he had first fully tested it upon himself. Might it not be poison? Might it not kill? With that self-sacrificing spirit so characteristic of man, Noah first tried it fully upon himself. Beer was discovered not long after. Herodotus informs us that in the corn province of Egypt, where no wines grew, the people drank a sort of wine, made of barley. This, it is thought, is the strong drink mentioned, together with wine, in many places in the Old Testament. It is thought, by those who have given most attention to the food of the original race, that different foods were introduced, much in the following order, viz.: Fruits, seeds, herbs, bread, milk, fish, flesh, wine and ale; to which may be added, butter, honey, eggs, olive oil and cheese."—Dio Lewis.

VEILED ANGELS, OR AFFLICTION.

Unnumbered blessings, rich and free,
Have come to us, our God, from Thee.

Sweet tokens written with Thy name.
Bright angels from Thy face they came.

Some came with open faces bright,
Aglow with heaven's own living light,

And some were veiled, trod soft and slow,
And spoke in voices grave and low.

Veiled angels, pardon! if with tears
We met you first, and many fears,

We take you to our hearts no less;
We know you come to teach and bless.

We know the love from which you come;
We trace you to our Father's home.

We know how radiant and how kind
Your faces are, those veils behind.

We know those veils, one happy day,
In earth or heaven, shall drop away;

And we shall see you as ye are,
And learn why thus ye sped from far.

But what the joy that day shall be,
We know not yet; we wait to see.

For this, O angels, well we know
The way ye came our souls shall go;

Up to the love from which ye come,
Back to our Father's blessed home.

And bright each face, unveil'd shall shine,
Lord, when the veil is rent from Thine.

Strange Event in a Sisters of Mercy Convent in St. Louis.

In the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, corner of Twenty-third and Morgan Street, St. Louis, Mo., a wonderful cure has just occurred which has caused a great sensation, and is authenticated by clergymen, Sisters of Mercy, and reputable physicians.

Theresa Schafer, a quiet, modest, well-behaved girl, 22 years of age, was reared in St. Vincent's German Orphan Asylum until ten years of age, when she was adopted by Mr. Schafer, who was childless. For several years her health had failed more and more, until finally a great tumor appeared on her right side, in the region of the liver, causing her severe pain.

A number of very able physicians attempted to cure her, but in vain, and at last, after praying for many days, she seemed at the point of death, and was given up by the doctors, when she went into a trance, and was at once, as she alleges, cured by spirit aid. One very able doctor says:—

On the morning of Saturday, August 27th, I was consulted by the sister in charge to know if the last rites of the church should not be performed, or rather to learn if the patient was not dying, so that the Sacrament might be given. I found her in an unconscious and evidently in a dying condition. It was my impression that she might survive as much as twenty-four hours, hardly more. I left the house immediately after, and on the following morning I again visited the institution and found the patient entirely well. On Monday, August 28, she was examined by Drs. Papin, Cooper, Quries and myself; the tumor was gone, the functions of the body were evidently in a perfectly healthy condition and properly performed, and the patient was well.

M. Yarnal, M. D.,
N. Ninth St., St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 9, 1871.
Other doctors confirm this statement.

Let me say that the house of our worship is not any cathedral like St. Peter's, nor any church like St. Paul's, but in our every-day lives. The altar of our religion is within our hearts, and its consecrating fires burn brightest and best when most of truth and purity are gathered in heavenly accord. The holy flames ascending from such altars will purify all homes and keep them free from guile. I believe in home and domestic virtues—in the family and in fidelity to the love out of which it should always spring; and more especially do I believe in attaining to that love which shall be so perfect as to be continuous; with increasing years continually growing deeper and broader and nearer akin to that of angels, and which shall finally overleap the barrier of the grave, swallowing death up in an eternal and victorious joy. It is to Spiritualism as a religious faith, and to the concomitants of Spiritualism, in the various beneficent reforms which are based on its doctrine of the equality of souls, that I look for that influence which is to secure spiritual perfection in the earthly family. The popular notion that Spiritualism is a foe to and a disorganizer of society, is true only in the sense that it seeks to burn, as with fire, the gross materiality which now rules the family, and substitute for it the domination of spiritualised and intellectualized affection; and finally, it teaches that the perfect earthly family is never dissolved.—Mrs. Woodhull.

J. Jefferson Reilly called on us on his way to Connecticut, to fill an engagement with Mrs. E. Annie Hinman. He looks well and is in good spirits, his arm which was broken by the falling of a window sash upon it is doing well, and we are glad to know, will not interfere with his holding public circles.

Cephas B. Lynn has just closed a very successful course of lectures in the New Hall of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, at Broad and Spring Garden Sts.

For every conflict of feeling is borne to the soul a higher revealing, drawing us up from this vale of tears to the bright homes of the angel spheres.

M. M. Jones.

When a man lives with God, his voice shall be as sweet as the murmur of the brook and the rustle of the corn. Emerson.

Victoria C. Woodhull will lecture at Institute Hall, Broad and Spring Garden streets, on Thursday, the 9th of November, at 8 P. M.

THE SMITTEN CITY.

BY GEORGE ALFRED TOWNSEND.

I heard a parson of the school of Baalam
Lift up the lesson of the flaming town,
And, like a pedler in the will of heaven,
Show how its sins invoked the Sovereign frown.

Thus the dead lion ever is insulted
By asses' colts, whose pity is a blow,
And fallen empires find their last misfortune
In shallow platitudes from fool and foe.

Bright Christian capital of lakes and prairie,
Heaven had no interest in thy scourge and scathe;
Thou wert the newest shrine of our religion,
The youngest witness of our hope and faith.

Not in thy embers do we rake for folly,
But like a martyr's ashes gather thee,
With chastened pride and tender melancholy,—
The miracle thou wast and yet will be.

Not merely in the homages of churches,
Or bells of praise tolled o'er the inland seas,—
Thou glorified our God and human nature
With meeter works and grander melodies

Of cheerful toil and willing enterprises,
Of hearty faith in freedom and in man;
The hoar old capitals looked on in wonder
To see the swift strong race this stripling ran.

How like the sun he rose above the marshes,
And built the world beneath his airy feet,
And changed the course of immemorial rivers,
And lapped the lakes for water cool and sweet.

How skilfully the golden grain transmuted
To blocks of sail and mercers of spars,
And, like another Noah, bade creation
March in the teeming mazes of his ark.

Yet in his power, most frank and democratic,
He roused no envious witness of his joy;
And in the stature of the prince and hero
We saw the laughing dimples of a boy.

Still wise and apt among the oldest merchants,
His young example steered the wary mart,
And amplest credit poured its gold around him,
And trade imperial gave scope for art.

His architectures passed all human splendor,
The immigration Goth drew wondering near,
To see his shafts and arches tall and slender
Branch o'er the new homes of this pioneer.

The Greek and Roman there might see rebuilded,
In vastness equal and in style as pure,
The merchants' markets like a palace gilded,
White marble walls and deep catafalques.

His two score bridges swinging on their pivots,
The long and laden line of vessels sped,
While he, impatient, marched beneath the sluices
His hosts, like Cyrus, in the river's bed.

Then, when all weak predictions proved but scandal,
And the wild marshes grew a sovereign's home,
A dozing cow o'erset an orchid's candle,—
Once more a fool fired the Ephesian dome.

The artless winds that blew o'er plains of cattle,
And cooled the corn through all the summer days,
Plunged like wild steeds in pastime or in battle,
Straight in the blinding brightness of the blaze.

And down fell bridge, and parapet, and lintel;
The blazing barques were all drifting one by one;
The mighty city wrapped its head in splendor,
And sank into the waters like a sun!

O that great master! champion of the people,
Tribune august, who e'er kept righteous court!
Long after fire had toppled church and steeple,
It stood amid the ruins like a fort.

High and serene its cornices extended,
Though scorched by smoke and of the flames the prey,
Above the vault, where grim, and calm, and splendid
The sleeping lions of its presses lay.

Till, looking round, it, in a wondering pity,—
Itself alone, erect, intact, upreared,—
Disdaining to outlive the glorious city,
With innate heat transfigured, disappeared.

Yet from the grave Chicago's wondrous spirit
Comes forth all brightness o'er the darkened town,
To say again, "Lo! I am with you, brethren,
With silver thorns I wear my civic crown!

"To die is sweet embalmed in your compassion;
Your wine and oil make life in every rest;
Oh! let me lean a little while upon you,
And walk to strength in your encouragement."

SPIRITS OR IMPOSTORS?

The Wonderful Performances at Moravia, New York.

From the Golden Age.

In regard to the singular phenomena described in the letters of two correspondents, in another part of this sheet, we offer no opinion. They purport to be visible manifestations of the forms and faces of departed spirits at the residence of Mr. Morris Keeler, at Moravia, N. Y. Similar phenomena, occuring at the same place, have been described to us by various credible witnesses—persons whom we know, respect and believe. It would be easy to mock at these strange things and laugh them away. But such is not in consonance with our journalistic habit of giving a fair hearing to all new ideas, however much at variance these may be with pre-established custom or belief. Many of the most prominent Spiritualists in the country have made a personal investigation into these Moravian marvels. The testimony of intelligent and upright people as to what they have seen with their own eyes, cannot be brushed away by the incredulous with a frown or sneer. All the witnesses with whom we have conversed—not less than six—testify that, so far as they were able to judge, there was no fraud, nor any possibility of fraud; that, on the contrary, the manifestations were what they purported to be, namely, the revelations of departed souls to mortal eyes—assuming, for the purposes of identification, the recognizable faces and figures which they possessed before death. We leave the intelligent and impartial reader to decide for himself.

From the New York Sun.

Moravia, a beautiful little village of Cayuga county, containing perhaps 2,000 inhabitants, situated on the line of the Southern central railroad, at the head of Owasco Lake, and eighteen miles south of Auburn, is just now the Mecca of American Spiritualism. In this out-of-the-way place are being produced physical manifestations of so-called Spiritual phenomena of the most wonderful and startling character, which, if not explained by scientific investigation to be the veriest humbuggery, must go far to establish the reality of the anorthodox belief in the intimate relations existing between the spirits of the departed and the dwellers upon earth. Theodore Tilton, in his romantic biography of Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull, says that she holds daily communion with the spirit of Demosthenes, who appears to her as a matured man of stately figure, clad in a Greek tunic, solemn and graceful in his aspect, strong in his influence, and altogether dominant over her life. Mrs. Daniels, a well-known Spiritualist of Boston, claims that her spirit friends, clothed in their right mind, appear to her as visibly as when in the flesh, and converse with her. Other vowed Spiritualists claim an intimate and visible relation with the inhabitants of the unseen world. But none of these people possess the power to introduce their ghostly visitors to others than themselves. The heavenly visions are monopolized by the devout seers, who are thus subjected to uncharitable taunts of imposition by the skeptical.

FACE TO FACE WITH THE DEAD.

In Moravia the spirits are brought face to face with all seekers, whether believers or skeptics, and the long time unused voice again give utterance to the ears of all who desire to hear whatsoever the spirit hath to say. Black spirits and white, good spirits and bad, the ghost of the untutored savage, as well as the immortal part of the greatest statesmen of all times, here come unbidden, habilitated afresh seemingly with flesh and blood, to converse with mortals. Nor time nor seasons, daylight or darkness disturbs the coming or interferes with the utterances of these strange visitors from an unknown world.

The phenomenon is of recent development—that is, within a few years; and as it has not been trumpeted abroad as a catchpenny trick through the agency of extended advertising, the knowledge of it has spread but slowly, though now it is known in spiritual circles throughout the land, each pilgrim to the ghostly shrine proclaiming it to a hundred friends, and extending it, like the circling ripple that follows from a pebble dropped in mid ocean, to the uttermost bounds. And so it happens that throngs visit and commune the communion of the spirits in this modern Nazareth.

THE PROPRIETOR OF THE SPIRITS.

Mr. Morris Keeler, the proprietor of the house in which the phenomenon occurs, is a forehanded farmer of Cayuga county, owning and occupying one of the best farms in that county, situated in the immediate suburbs of the village of Moravia. His father lived there before him, and he has several brothers and other relations in the immediate vicinity. Besides cultivating his home farm, on the hills overlooking the village and the beautiful Owasco Valley, Mr. Keeler has another farm in the middle of the plain below. He is also a stockholder in the national bank of Moravia, a stockholder in the southern central railroad, and a quarter owner of the most extensive and valuable business block in the village, with other smaller properties scattered about. He is a plain, coarse, ignorant, asthmatic man, of about sixty years of age, and probably 200 pounds weight. He is as garrulous as he is ignorant, and as clumsy as an ox. He became interested in Spiritualism twenty years ago, since which time his house has been the headquarters of all the believers of that school for miles around. On Sundays especially they crowded upon his hospitality, coming on foot and in wagons, relying on Mr. Keeler for forage for their animals as well as food for themselves, until at last his friends became alarmed lest he should be eaten out of house and home and become a burden upon them.

THE FAMILY OF THE SPIRITUAL PROPRIETOR.

Mrs. Keeler is a wiry-built, thin-visaged, white-haired matron, of Connecticut origin, plain of tongue and tireless of foot, a good housekeeper and an excellent farmer's wife, devoid of all refinement, and nearly as ignorant as her lord. True to her Connecticut instincts, she worships money with a devotion scarcely exceeded by her reverence for the spirit, and to her shrewdness in this respect, perhaps more than to anything else, her husband is indebted that he is not now an occupant of the county poorhouse. Mrs. Keeler had some religious convictions in early life, and scouted her husband's faith in Spiritualism, making much fun of his table-tipping and spirit-rapping nonsense, as she termed it, when he first began to invite such manifestations. But she soon became a convert to his faith, discarding all her early religious training, and has since been as much of a Spiritualist as he.

THE MEDIUM.

Fifteen years ago, or thereabouts, a young Irish girl made application to the Keelers for employment as a maid of all work. She was young—scarcely fifteen years old—of comely appearance, though miserably clad, and protesting utter destitution. Mrs. Keeler did not want a servant, and told the poor girl so, which brought a flood of tears from the little homeless one's eyes, and a fresh appeal to take her in for charity's sake. Mrs. Keeler finally gave the girl something to eat, and also some old clothes that were more decent and comfortable than the ones she wore, and then sent her away, assuring her that she did not want any help. The girl went down into the village and secured employment at the tavern. Mr. Keeler met her in the street sometime afterward, and, on learning where she was employed, advised her that a tavern was a bad and dangerous place for a young girl. The girl replied that it was the only place she could find, and that she must either stay there or starve. Mr. Keeler then took pity on her and bade her go up to his house and stay there. She went gladly, and after Mr. Keeler's return home and explanation of affairs to his wife, she was duly installed as a servile member of the household. She early manifested an interest in the table tipping and spirit rapping that were so common in that dwelling, and, with the familiarity that exists between employer and employed in the country, was permitted to join the circles that were nightly formed to invite spiritual visitations. It then became apparent that the timid spirits came more boldly when the girl Mary was present than at other times, and so it happened in course of time that no circle could be formed without her presence, and she was finally recognized as a medium.

INFLUENCE OF THE MEDIUM ON THE SPIRITS.

Under her mediumship the spiritual manifestations became more startling, and rapid advances were made in the development of all the more generally known spiritual phenomena. Spirits wrote on paper for her; they spoke through her strange messages to those who came from abroad; they prophesied through her; discovered lost property; detected crime and criminals; directed the conduct of those in whom they were interested, and wrought all the miracle that modern Spiritualism claims as possible. Her fame rapidly spread throughout all that region, and visitors came in throngs to see her, bringing their sick to be cured by her, and their mysteries for her superhuman examination. Then it was that Mr. Keeler's friends became alarmed at the largeness of his hospitality and the excessive demands that were made upon it. But the wonder did not cease here. The spirits, speaking through the wonderful medium, made more absolute demands upon the honest farmer's purse. First he was directed to purchase a gold watch and chain for the medium, which direction he promptly obeyed. Then the spirits said he must buy a piano; but, as there was no one to play it, the mortal man hesitated and thought of his dollars. But the message was repeated with emphasis, and the piano was purchased. Again the oracle pronounced the spirit's order that the medium must be instructed to play upon the new-bought and costly instrument; whereupon a music teacher was hunted up, and the green Irish girl was put through the mysteries of one, two, three; go a little faster; one, two, three; one, two, three, mind that half note; one, two, three, and so on, ad infinitum, until wearying of the monotony of the work, and on the principle that misery loves company, she brought a voice from the spirit land ordering Mrs. Keeler also to take lessons. Mrs. Keeler promptly mounted the piano stool, but was soon forced to admit that even the spirits could not put suppleness into her stiff joints, and that her fingers were more at home in the bread dough or the butter tray than on the keys of a piano.

MARRIAGE OF THE MEDIUM.

In the meantime the medium married. But that so good a thing should be kept in the family the marriage was brought about with a young man named Andrews, a member of the Keeler household. Within a few weeks after the marriage a child or child-grand-child was born.

The occurrence of the events that have been so hastily narrated brought about the necessity for the growing Andrews family to look out for the future, whereupon the good spirits charged Mrs. Andrews with a message to Mr. Keeler directing him to make a deed of his valuable farm to her. The message was promptly delivered, but not so promptly obeyed. The old man thought the spirits were going just a little too fast. He couldn't doubt the verity of the message, but he did doubt his obligation to obey it, and is doubting still.

Next came a more grateful message. The spirits were not satisfied that Mr. Keeler should waste his substance in entertaining strangers, but he must charge tavern rates for their entertainment. This message was cheerfully received and obeyed with alacrity, and thenceforward visitors were charged fifty cents a meal, or a dollar a day for board with the ruling price for hay and oats for horses. Under this dispensation the spiritual manifestations have proven much more profitable to the Keelers than formerly. They do a large business, frequently having as many as a dozen or twenty human guests from abroad staying at their house at a time, while on Sundays the visitors come by the scores in their own conveyances.

FORESIGHT OF THE SPIRITS.

As if foreseeing this wonderful rush of guests, three or four years ago the spirits directed Mr. Keeler to tear down his old farm house and build a larger and more modern dwelling. To save expense in the matter, the spirits themselves furnished the plans and specifications for the building, directing its most minute features. The house was built according to these plans, and is the one now tenanted by Mr. and Mrs. Keeler and the little mysterious child-grandchild. Andrews and his wife in the mean time have built themselves a very fine house down in the village with money furnished by Keeler by spiritual direction. But the Keeler mansion is the one that most interests the reader. It is a large, square, two-story house, with a flat roof and wide cornice. On the west front, near the north corner, and facing the highway, is a square tower, rising a full story above the roof, and furnishing a splendid observatory. In the two stories below this tower forms bay windows for the main rooms, into which it opens. On these floors it is finished with three large windows, one filling its front and the others the two sides. A long wing extends back from the main building, furnishing a dining room, kitchen, washroom, wood room, and closets on the lower floor, and dormitories above. The house is painted a light drab on the outside, is furnished with Venetian shutters to all the windows, and stands on high ground about twenty feet back from the main highway leading from Moravia to Auburn.

MYSTERIOUS LIGHTS AND FILMY CLOUDS.

While this new house was in process of construction the wonderful medium developed a new power. Hitherto, it will have been observed, all the utterances of the spirits were made through her voice; that is, she would have, or pretend to have, secret or silent conferences with the unseen messengers from the other world, and then translate and pronounce the result with her own voice. But a little over two years ago she received a communication directing her to sit in a dark room with those who might desire to participate in any interviews with the spirits, when, obeying the injunction, greater wonders than ever before were manifested. Bright lights, apparently minute balls of electricity, would appear throughout the room and go dancing about in the darkness. Filmy forms, shapeless and vague, like the fleeciest cloud that drifts across the heavens, would appear moving around in the black darkness that prevailed. Drafts of cold air would strike the sitters, though it was apparent that no door or other aparture was opened to admit the air. Chairs would be rudely jostled under their occupants, and would be placed upon the faces of the startled participants in the seance. Even the footfalls of the supposed ghostly strangers could be heard about the apartment, and evidences of physical power would be displayed in the disarrangement and removal of furniture. But, strangest of all, out from the impenetrable night that filled the room would come sleep, hollow, and sepulchral voices, audible to all, professing to speak the minds of the inhabitants of eternity. No longer with the borrowed voice of the medium did the mysterious strangers make utterance, but their own proper vocal organs served them as when they dwelt upon earth.

Among the ghosts or spirits who appeared at these unseen orgies, were a couple who claimed to be immortal native Americans—representatives of Fenimore Cooper's noble savage tribes. These were a male and a female spirit, who assumed at once the position of guardian angels to Mr. and Mrs. Keeler respectively. It is not known nor is it material what names they were called by when they roamed the trackless forests of earth or paddled their own canoes on Owasco Lake; but to this day they continue their angelic supervision over the affairs of the Keeler family, and, in the advanced stage of spiritual development now to be witnessed in that house, are frequent visitors and can be seen by those who patronize the ghostly show.

We are now prepared to spread before the reader a more clear and intelligent account of the actual occurrences in that strange resort of stranger visitors, which are daily witnessed by scores of curists or interested observers, and may be seen by anybody who will undertake the pilgrimage to the appointed rendezvous.

THE SPIRITS WANT A ROOM FOR THEIR OWN ACCOMMODATION.

The strange voices and meaningless eccentricities of the darkened chamber had continued but a short time—barely long enough to impart confidence to the constant human participants—and the new house had but recently been finished, when the aboriginal protegés of Mr. Keeler informed him that wonderful things were about to be developed, and that all the world would be quickly converted to Spiritualism; that in this great work he and his household were to play an important part. Mr. Keeler listened and wondered. Mrs. Keeler listened and believed. The woman Mary Andrews, the medium, listened and keep silent. Then came the voice of the male savage ghost again, and gave sundry directions for the preparation of a room in the house in which spiritual visitations should in future be received. The room designated was the main front apartment on the second floor, opening into the tower, of which the annexed is a diagram:

A. Exterior windows.
B. Head of stairs from below.
C. Door inclosing staircase leading to the observatory above.
D. Small closet under the stairs.
E. Doorways.
F. Piano.
G. Board partition inclosing the tower portion of the room, and forming the sanctum sanctorum, or spirits' cabinet.
H. Position of chairs for witnesses of the angelic visitors, and auditors of the spiritual declaimers.

DESCRIPTION OF THE ROOM.

The room is about fifteen feet square, exclusive of the alcove or bay window formed by the tower, and has a single window on the north side, opposite the door leading into the hall. This is the only door in the room, with the exception of the little half-door, about thirty inches high, enclosing the small closet under the observatory stairs, and which is the only closet in the room. The tower projection is about 4 feet deep from the front of the main building, and perhaps 8 feet wide. It has three windows, as shown in the diagram, the centre or front window being double, and extending nearly across the front of the tower, and the side windows, with their casings, fill within a few inches the entire sides. The floor and ceiling of the main room are continued without break into this extension. The height of the ceiling from the floor is ten feet. The ceiling and walls are hardfinished and kalsomined. The wook work is all painted white except that of the board partition forming the spirits' cabinet, which is covered on the outside with cheap wall paper.

The alterations in this apartment directed by the aboriginal spirit, consisted merely in closing the windows and constructing the spirits' cabinet. The blinds of all the windows are shut, and the slats are carefully closed. In addition to this precaution for the exclusion of light, the windows are boarded upon the inside, and over all heavy drapery is hung, so that not a ray of light can penetrate through those channels. The door is secured with listing to make it tight, and as an additional precaution a piece of carpeting is kept in readiness to be laid against the bottom when the door is closed; so that when the room is shut the darkness of the tomb pervades it.

THE CABINET

is formed, as indicated above, by a rough board partition stretching across the interior opening of the tower, as indicated by the letter G in the diagram. This partition—whether purposely for the greater mystification of skeptics or accidentally is immaterial—is placed a few inches beyond the angles formed by the junction of the tower with the main building, so that, as will at once be seen, access to the enclosed apartment can only be had through the main room or by the windows, unless, indeed, trap doors through the floor or ceiling should furnish a means of entrance. The floor of the main room is covered with rag carpeting, so common in the country, and the same covering extends over the floor of the cabinet. In fact, the partition rests upon the centre of one breadth. A careful examination shows that this carpet is securely tacked to the floor on the remaining three sides of the cabinet; and as no break or cut in it can be discovered, it must be admitted that no trap can exist there. Moreover, the same formation of rooms exists on the floor below, and the ceiling of the room underneath the cabinet presents an unbroken surface; so that ingress to the cabinet from that direction cannot be possible. The board partition enclosing the space allotted to the spirits is but 7 or 8 feet high, leaving a clear space of two feet or more between the top of the cabinet and the ceiling of the room, which is open to the room. The cabinet is furnished with a cover of plain boards similar to those that form the partition in front. Paper is pasted over the joints of this rough woodwork to exclude the light.

THE FURNITURE.

The only visible or discoverable entrance to the cabinet, other than through the closed and boarded windows, is by a rude doorway left in the partition at the end nearest the piano. The entrance is secured, when the show begins, by an equally rough shutter or door, made of two boards held together by cleats, which is fitted into the aperture and secured with wooden buttons. Midway between this doorway and the further end of the partition, is a small aperture or window, about 18 inches square, placed about 6 feet high from the floor, at which the spirits present themselves and display their wonders. This aperture is covered with a curtain of black fulled cloth, hanging on the inside and secured only at the top. The furniture of the dark closet consists simply of a chair in which the medium sits, and a tin speaking trumpet which the ghosts whose lungs are feeble sometimes have occasion to use in order to make themselves heard.

In the main room the furniture is nearly as meagre as in the sanctum. There are a dozen plain chairs for the occupancy of mortals, some with their backs broken through the antics of rough spirits, an old fashioned settee for accommodation of visitors when the company exceeds the number of chairs, a stove, and the well used and discordant piano which was purchased under spiritual direction.

A clergyman was exhorting those with anxious and troubled consciences to be sure and call on their pastor for guidance and prayer. Said he: "To show you, my brethren, the blessed results of these visits with your pastor, I will state to you that only yesterday a gentleman of wealth called upon me for counsel and instruction; and now, to-day, my friends—to-day—he sits among us a happy husband and a father and a Christian." A young lady in the audience whispered: "Wasn't that pretty quick work?"

"A man in Davenport, Iowa, offers through the columns of a local paper, to give $50 to any man who will elope with his wife.

At a hotel at Long Branch, the other day, one little girl asked another to dance with her. "Indeed I won't," was the reply, "what do I want another girl dancing me for?"

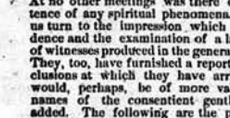
A SCIENTIFIC REPORT ON SPIRITUALISM.



The London Dialectical Society's Investigation—A Form in Nature that has Intelligence—Pertinent remarks of the Boston Journal of Chemistry.

On the 26th of January, 1869, the London Dialectical Society appointed a committee "to investigate the phenomenon alleged to be spiritual manifestations and report thereon." The committee originally consisted of twenty-eight members of the society, but two of these gentlemen declined to sit, and subsequently eight other gentlemen were invited and agreed to join. This body of thirty-four, being obviously too large to conduct inquiries by personal experiment, was split up into six sub-committees, and these were requested to make such investigations as were possible and send in their report. This has accordingly been done, and we have here their evidence, along with a mass of correspondence and other communications, all bearing on the subject in hand. The whole forms one of the most curious volumes which have been published for many a day, and furnishes matter for the most interesting study, quite apart from the main topic of Spiritualism. We shall however, merely summarize in a very brief fashion the reports of the six sub-committees. The first of these bodies went to work in a most thorough and business-like manner, and managed to hold no fewer than forty meetings. At thirty-four of these some of the so-called Spiritualistic phenomena were observed; and the witnesses report that they have no longer any doubt about the existence of a certain force which, under certain bodily or mental conditions of one or more persons present, is sufficient to set in motion heavy substances, without contact between such substances and the body of any one of those persons. Further, they believe that this force "can cause sounds to proceed, distinctly audible to all present, from solid substances not in contact with nor having any visible or material connection with the body or any person present, and which sounds are proved to proceed from such substances by the vibrations which are distinctly felt when they are touched." Finally, they hold that this force is frequently directed by intelligence. These conclusions are cautiously worded, and scarcely touch upon the topic of communication with spirits, which is abundantly handled in the minutes of the proceedings of this same sub-committee, published in the appendix. Sub-committee No. 2, however, is less vague in its reports. Here we have detailed accounts of all manner of manifestations; which were "presumably" Spiritualistic. By the simple process of rapping, messages were brought to persons present from departed friends, important revelations made about property, and so forth. The deputies are of the opinion that they "presumably" established occasional communication with a number of spirits, or intelligences, announced to be such by themselves, many of whom stated they were connected in various degrees of relationship to certain members of our party for whom they professed a friendly regard;" and "that such presumed spirits displayed distinct individualities, each having a manner peculiar to itself, and rapping delicately, emphatically, or deliberately, as the case might be, expressing as it were character, mood, and temper." Sub-committee No. 3 met six times, and the witnesses seem to have been chiefly occupied in watching and testing the lifting of tables. Nevertheless, they had a few messages rapped out, and thus declare in report that, "besides the evidence this afforded of the presence of this not generally recognized force, we believe we have had in these experiments, evidence of an intelligence directing it—as in moving by request in a particular direction—tilting a certain number of times as required—and by tilts or taps spelling out words or sentences addressed to those present." Sub-committee No. 4 remarks, in a rather contemptuous fashion, that "nothing occurred in the presence of this sub-committee worth recording."

HOME COULD DO NOTHING.

Sub-committee No. 5 seems to have been the most important of these bodies, and forthwith addressed itself to the tackling of Mr. Home. The first seance was held in April, 1869. In addition to the members of the committee, there were present two or three persons interested in the matter, among them two noblemen whose names have been much mixed up in the reports of "communications." On this occasion the manifestations were trifling, a week afterward another seance was held. There were, as before, a few raps, and the table moved slightly; but nothing further. A week later Mr. Home again met the committee, with no result. The fourth seance, which produced only the same trifling phenomena, was the last; for Mr. Home became unwell, and the investigation was not resumed. The report states; "During the inquiry Mr. Home afforded every facility for examination, and appeared to be anxious to further the object which the committee had in view. It is almost unnecessary to add that nothing occurred at any of the meetings which could be attributed to supernatural causes. The members had fully expected that they would have witnessed some of the extraordinary levitations of Mr. Home, but he explained at the opening of the inquiry that the phenomena produced through his agency were of uncertain manifestation, and that he had no power whatever to produce them at will." The last of the subcommittees, No. 6, has to report that nothing occurred, except when a lady visitor once brought two children with her, and these being placed at a small chess table, proceeded to rock it to and fro, "to their own intense delight, and to the amusement of the company. At no other meetings was there even the pretence of any spiritual phenomena." Now, let us turn to the impression which all this evidence and the examination of a large number of witnesses produced in the general committee. They, too, have furnished a report of the conclusions at which they have arrived, which would, perhaps, be of more value had the names of the consentient gentlemen been added. The following are the propositions:

1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibration accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance.

2. That the sounds and vibrations often occur at the request, or to the number of taps, given by persons present, and that by a previously agreed code of communications and spell out coh
4. That the answers and ses, for the most part, of a commonplace facts are sometimes correctly given which are only known to one of the persons present.
5. That the circumstances under which the phenomena occur are variable, the most prominent fact being that the presence of certain persons seems necessary to their occurrence, and that of others generally adverse; but this difference does not appear to depend upon any belief or disbelief concerning the phenomena.
6. That nevertheless, the occurrence of the phenomena is not insured by the presence or absence of such persons respectively.

A HAND IN IT.

But immediately after the report of the sub-committees comes a remarkable statement from the Chairman of the General Committee, who tells us not only that his eyes "have been a little opened by some of the manifestations which it has been his duty to witness," but that he feels bound, both on his own part and on account of other dissentients, to record the conviction that "the framing of the report, and the selection, publication, and reviewing of the evidence has practically drifted into the hands of devoted and zealous Spiritualists, who are led by skilled and successful writers." This is a serious charge to make; but, on the other hand, we find an editorial note asserting that of the five acting members of the editing sub-committees, only one is a Spiritualist, whereupon the Chairman of committee replies that he designates as a Spiritualist any one who believes in the genuineness of "mediums" and of the phenomena which they produce. All that we need say on this matter is that the "sub-editing committee," whether they are believers or unbelievers, have not endeavored to suppress certain letters from eminent men, which speak very frankly. We have Mr. G. H. Lewes writing that, "in my experience, and it has been large, the means (of producing the so-called Spiritualistic phenomena) have always proved to be either deliberate imposture, aided by the unconscious assistance of spectators, or the well-known effects of expectant attention;" while Prof. Huxley sends the following answer to an invitation:

SIR: I regret that I am unable to accept the invitation of the council of the Dialectical Society to co-operate in a committee for the investigation of "Spiritualism"—and for two reasons. In the first place, I have no time for such an inquiry, which would involve much trouble, unless it were unlike all inquiries of that kind I have known much annoyance. In the second place, I take no interest in the subject. The only case in which I have had the opportunity of examining into for myself was as gross an imposture as ever came under my notice. But supposing the phenomena to be genuine, they do not interest me. If anybody would endow me with the faculty of listening to the chatter of old women and curates in the hearsel cathedral town, I should decline the privilege, having better things to do; and if the folk in the spiritual world do not talk more wisely and sensibly than their friends report them to do, I put them in the same category. The only good that I can see in a demonstration of the truth of "Spiritualism" is to furnish an additional argument against suicide. Better live a crossing-sweeper than die and be made to talk twaddle by a "medium" hired at a guinea a seance. I am sir, etc.,

T. H. HUXLEY.

THE NEW "PSYCHIC FORCE."

Through the politeness of Mr. Colman Sellers, of Philadelphia, we received advance sheets of the Journal of the Franklin Institute, containing his paper, "Remarks on Experimental Investigations of a New Force, by Wm. Crookes, F. R. S." In this paper Mr. Sellers endeavors to show that Prof. Crookes has been duped by Home the "medium," and that the occurrences which took place in connection with him were nothing but tricks. The oscillating board experiment, and that with the accordion, described by Prof. Crookes, Mr. Sellers declares to be a very imitation, and in a manner scarcely rising to a level with the sleight-of-hand performances of traveling mountebanks. Mr. Sellers is one of the most accomplished mechanicians in the country, and he has contrived some beautiful and intricate pieces of machinery; and further, he is not only a maker of mechanical puzzles, but he possesses in an eminent degree the capability of using them skillfully. He is in short known in private among his friends as a prestidigitateur of the highest excellence. We speak of this, because it indicates his eminent fitness to judge of the nature of mechanical contrivances designed to deceive and puzzle the inexperienced.

So far as the experiments go which are so carefully described by Prof. Crookes, we do not regard them as of much importance. They are certainly trifling and insignificant, compared with phenomena of a similar nature which might undoubtedly have been observed in hundreds of private families in London, at the time of his interview with Home. The three gentlemen, from their mental discipline and experience in research, ought not to have been easily deceived; they ought not to have fallen a easy victims to the clumsy tricks of a charlatan, or one skillful at prestidigitation. Recent advices from Messrs. Crookes, Huggins, and Cox, state that continued and more diversified experiments have been made, all of which were confirmatory of the genuineness of the phenomena, and tended to fix the belief in the existence of the new "psychic force." C. F. Varley, F. R. S., the eminent electrician, has written a long letter to Prof. Crookes in which he describes what he "has seen," and urges him to continue his researches, intimating that he himself believes the disturbances to be the work of "disembodied spirits." They propose to form a Psychological Society to be composed of twenty or thirty competent gentlemen, whose special work it shall be to meet every fortnight and carefully investigate the phenomena. We do not think much will come of this, as "committees of investigation," and societies established to perform special work, are usually composed of very incongruous materials, and are apt to quarrel among themselves at an early period in their labors.

As regards the phenomena; after attempts at investigations, extending over a period of a quarter of a century, and after having been brought in contact with every phase of it, we are unable to give information as to how it may be "investigated." Every mechanical, chemical, philosopical appliance, so far as we know, fails to elucidate any principle or shed any light upon the nature of the phenomena, and we shall be glad to be led out of the darkness by the English philosophers. We have found it quite easy to imitate many of the mechanichal movements, sounds, etc., by the aid of electro-magnetism, chemical reactions, and mechanical contrivances. Twenty years ago we constructed an electro-magnetic device which gave the "rappings" perfectly, and by artfully arranging it in a room, we were able to deceive for a long time a wide circle of intelligent friends, and were looked upon as a "medium." The movements of small tables, chairs, etc., after the manner of the true "psychic force," may be readily imitated by any ingenious mechanic, give him time enough to construct the devices and a proper place in which to arrange them.

Undoubtedly we should be greatly interested in Mr. Sellers's ingenious performances, and quite possibly they are so skillfully arranged that, with all our experience, we might fail to detect his methods, or the source of his tricks; still there must be a wide difference in the conditions under which he is able to exhibit them as contrasted with what is seen every day in hundreds of private families in every State in the Union.

None of the performances of Mrs. Home, or the "Fox girls," or the Davenports, or any other of the professional mediums, would probably convince us of the reality of the phenomena in question.

We have often attempted to investigate them as observed in the families of our most trusted friends, families where the moral uprightness and high character of every inmate rendered suspicion impossible. It has not been our business however to permit this known condition of things to deter us from the most thorough and persistent search, and we believe, if the astounding physical disturbances witnessed had been due to secret springs, wires, electro-magnets, etc., we should have found them. No, the prestidigitation theory fails to explain the phenomena, and so do ventriloquism, sleight-of-hand, and all such tricks and devices. Science, within its present boundaries, has no methods for explaining or investigating it, and here we seem to stand at the present time. We may as well call it the "psychic force," as to employ any other term, and certainly while Prof. Crookes and his illustrious associates will probably fail to shed much light on the dark subject, they ought not to be ridiculed and abused by their equals, much less by those who are vastly their inferiors in every department of learning. In research and knowledge of physical science, Prof. Crookes and Mr. Huggins are certainly the equals of any men living.

Letter from Boston.

BRO. JONES:—I thought a few lines from the "Hub" might not be considered amiss for your readers. Boston for the East and Chicago for the West, seem to be the radiating points of Spiritualism. I have met many fine specimens of human nature here among the Spiritualistic ranks, including the editors of the Banner of Light, Dr. Gardner, Dr. Pike and some of the magnetic healers, who, aided by spirit power, would sometimes diagnose, heal and send away a patient before an old school physician would get through with feeling of the pulse and asking questions preparatory to a three months' treatment. There are said to be two hundred healers in Boston, which mighty spread of the newer methods of doing things, shows that the regular school has very good reason to be alarmed at their progress, and to aim to put them down. Spiritualism has become an established fact here; and after seeing the comparatively small audiences that gather to hear their speakers in many other cities, it seems quite surprising to see the thousands that pack the Music Hall here every Sunday, even to the second and third story. The wonderful and sublime looking organ seems to preside over the scene, and a quartette choir, one of the finest in the United States, gives harmony to the occasion. There are various smaller meetings and lyceums held in different parts of the city. In the John A. Andrew Hall, Mrs. Carlisle holds a meeting every Sunday morning, at half past ten o'clock, and gives addresses from various spirit friends of those present, mentioning names and circumstances which will be recognized from all parts of the audience. Such meetings are far more effective and convincing to the skeptical than any speech without tests. At the close of one of her meetings, Judge Ladd, a gentleman of high culture, arose and commended the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, and several of us backed him, and spoke of the condition of things since the fire. The result was a fine subscription for your paper, taken on the spot. Among the remarkable mediums here which I have met, is a Mrs. Hardy, 125 West Concord street. She holds public circles in the double parlors of her residence every Sunday and Wednesday evenings. The parlors and sometimes halls are crowded. I was there one Sunday evening at which she gave tests to most of those present. Spirits would come and speak in their own style to their friends, showing their knowledge of the most secret thoughts and actions of those present. Children would come and call for their parents by name and talk to them in all the sweet impulsive style of childhood. A daughter came and called for her father and mother who were present, manifesting an undying love for them in such an effecting way that a good part of the audience were in tears. How beautiful is Spiritualism which can thus give us back our lost friends and prove that they are about our pathway as guardian angels even while we mourn them as having gone far away. Mrs. Hardy gave a public circle at Elliott Hall for the Chicago sufferers, at which several hundred persons were present. Many fine tests were given. One spirit came, and calling a gentleman by name, told him that "some of his thoughts were wrong, especially when he supposed he could eventually become as wise as God himself, for God himself, as the higher spirits think, is going growing on to all eternity, as well as he." He answered that he had never made use of such an expression. "I know you have not said it, but you have thought it, and I have read your thoughts." The gentleman blushed and was silent, thus virtually admitting it.

I was much interested in attending the Banner of Light free circle. If Mrs. Conant is not under influence of spirits, then she must be the most remarkable woman that ever lived. For a pale, feeble woman to answer so many profound and intricate questions and personate so many characters all of her own personal skill, must at once stamp her as the greatest actor and most versatile thinker of the age.

While at New York a few days since, I met with a philanthropic company of persons with Stephen Pearl Andrews at their head, who assemble every Sunday at the rooms of the medium, Mrs. Kimball, 257 West 15th street. Some grand inspirations are given at this place, and enthusiastic souls are inspired by spiritual and human counsel to aim at noble things for humanity. Stephen Pearl Andrews, a much abused man, is pronounced by those best acquainted with him, to be a pure, high-toned man with grand conceptions, and aims for human good. He is just issuing a large work called the "Basic Outlines of Universology," to consist of over nine hundred pages octavo, and to explain the basic laws of society, government, and in short, of all the universe, and thus bring to a science what has thus far been only a fragmentary affair. I have heard some explanations of his views, and if I am not mistaken, his work is going to set the world to thinking.

From every direction I hear the advancing tide of progress. Exalted spirits are prophesying a new era, a millenial glory for the human race which is rapidly approaching. Our spiritual healers shall receive a greater power than ever over human maladies, not only the physical, but the spiritual power, to heal such diseases as intemperance, tobacco chewing, insanity and many other things which sadly block the world's progress. Let us all work in harmony, then, to this great end. Talking with Mr. Colby, of the Banner of Light, he agreed with me that there was too much strife among Spiritualistic leaders. Is not the spirit of love and tolerance, the very spirit of heaven? It saddens me to know that a good Spiritualist should do so noble an act as to bequeath a half a million of dollars to build a liberal educational institution and then forbid a clergyman ever to enter inside of its walls. Let us grow so large in our love that we can embrace the universe. Our cause is too mighty to be tottled over by the entering of a clergyman inside of our buildings. They have been too often vanquished in debate to make them any longer terrible to us, and we shall win over multitudes of them if we are wise and truly liberal as we profess to be. We need some tornadoes and some earthquakes to cleanse us from corruption; but the sunshine is more powerful than the storm. Judge Edmonds, Epes Sargent and William Howitt, are too logical to deal much in mere assertions, and too kind to be abusive. Let me close this free talk by quoting a motto from Bacon: "When a man calls you a fool without proving it, prove him to be one without calling him so." Yours, with wishes for greater success than you have ever had.

E. D. BABBITT.

Voices from the People.

HIGHLAND, WIS.—Thomas Stanley writes.—I send ten dollars, for which you will give me credit for three year's subscription to the JOURNAL, and may each of your subscribers do likewise.

ROSCOE, ILL.—John McAffee writes.—I sympathize with you in the fiery trial through which you have just passed. Glad you do not feel overcome by your affliction, and that the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL will continue to pay us its pleasant weekly visits. Inclosed you will find five dollars, post office order, to apply on subscription.

ALLIANCE, OHIO.—J. R. Haines writes.—Inclosed is post office order for sixteen dollars to pay my delinquency; also to pay for two new subscribers for the JOURNAL for one year. The response to your appeal should be prompt and liberal. Every Spiritualist should be willing to testify in a practical way their regard for the JOURNAL.

PRINCEVILLE, ILL.—E. W. Hitchcock writes.—Having received your circular, and contents noted of your embarrassed circumstances at this trying hour, I hasten as quick as it has been possible with me to respond to your call, to the utmost of my ability. Would to God I were able to send you a thousand dollars, and to all others who have been afflicted in this great conflagration and destruction of the once beautiful city of Chicago,—the great admired metropolis of the world. We feel the great loss here, and it will be felt throughout the great West, but with the generous and open hand of humanity coming to the rescue, I hope the day is not far distant when Chicago, the beautiful Chicago, will rise again in more splendor than before. The man who does not feel to aid and help under such circumstances as these, is not worthy of belonging to the race of humanity.

MENDOTA, MINN.—Mrs. J. L. Lewis writes.—Inclosed please find six dollars, which pays for the JOURNAL for two years. This is all I feel able to send you at present. One year ago the 11th of October, some kind friend sent the JOURNAL to me for one year. I like it very much; hope to receive it again soon. I remain your friend and well-wisher.

MOSHIERVILLE, MICH.—D. G. Mosher writes.—For many days I have waited for some tidings of the beloved JOURNAL, and after seven days from the time of its issue, I have received the little sheet of the 9th ult., a welcome visitor, though sad its tale. I rejoice in your determination to start the paper again. Though I am called upon to aid the suffering in our own state, I will venture to send my mite of two dollars inclosed, to extend my subscription and aid you.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—Mrs. I. F. Thirfield writes.—It was with much joy that I received the miniature copy of the 19th, informing me of your intention to resume the publication of the JOURNAL. I did not receive the first one, or you would have heard from me before. Inclosed find post office order for twenty dollars, for renewal of another year's subscription. You have my sympathy in your hour of trial. May you have strength given you from the spiritual and material worlds, to aid you in your noble work.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—C. H. Walters writes.—Inclosed I send you six dollars to renew my subscription to the JOURNAL for two years. I gave one hundred dollars the day of the fire for Chicago, and do not feel that I can do more at present, still I can not afford to see the JOURNAL fall.

DAVENPORT, IOWA.—J. S. Stanley writes.—As I have just seen one of your issues, No. 5, since the fire, asking for all the aid which you need to establish your much beloved and cherished JOURNAL, I shall respond to the best of my ability at this time. The issue above alluded to, did not come to me, although you might have sent one. I am glad to be partial, but still in spirit, and may ever be remain, if but to enjoy the blessed company of angel hosts that follow me. I shall inclose post office order for eight dollars. I hope for the full response of all good Spiritualists to your just call at this time of your great need. I am sorry that I can do no more.

NORTH CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—John S. Ladd writes.—On Sunday morning last, at John A. Andrew's Hall, Boston, the inclosed subscriptions, $49.70, for the JOURNAL, were handed me, which I transmit, with personal sympathy for your great losses. An additional small remittance will be sent you in a few days.

JEFFERSON, WIS.—Wm. Sanborn writes.—I have raised the little sum of twelve dollars, for which please give credit.

MADISON, WIS.—Lyman C. Draper writes.—I feel for your calamity, and regret exceedingly that my pecuniary condition is so reduced that I am not aid you beyond the pittance of ten dollars, which I inclose in a post office order on Chicago. Please place to my credit. I anxiously hope you may succeed in re-establishing the JOURNAL. You must succeed. God bless you.

WILLOUGHBY, OHIO.—Sam'l Smart writes.—Inclosed find our order on the postmaster of Chicago for twenty dollars. Should you succeed in establishing your paper, you may continue to send it to me until exhausted. I charge no interest, and as I am 72 years of age, I may pay for the paper as long as I shall be here to read it. So discontinue it at that time, unless you hear from me, with further orders

GALESBURG, MICH.—Levi Wood writes.—My time for which I had paid for the JOURNAL expired yesterday, and I now inclose five dollars to pay the coming year. I have just received your last issue, announcing the fact that you, with others, was burned out, but not crushed. I think the paper will be worth five dollars for the next year, and I hope all will be prompt in coming to the rescue. May the JOURNAL live and prosper, is the wish of your humble servant.

RAVENNA, OHIO.—S. M. Day writes.—Since I received your little circular, I have been trying to get subscribers for the JOURNAL, and have succeeded in raising fourteen dollars. Hoping to soon see our beloved JOURNAL on its feet, and that you may be rewarded, both by the visible and invisible worlds for your noble labors for the good of humanity, I am truly yours in the bonds of sympathy and fraternity.

ZOAR, IOWA.—Webster Ellyson writes.—I received immediately by the circular. Inclosed you will find two dollars and fifty cents.

GLOUCESTER CITY, N. J.—B. F. Reed writes. It is with no common measure of sadness we learn of the fate of the JOURNAL. We are poor in purse, but not in sympathy. We send you five dollars.

TITUSVILLE, PENN.—J. C. Chaffee writes.—Your little JOURNAL of Oct. 9th, was received, and should have been answered before, but I could not. Inclosed please find post office order for three dollars.

UTICA, N. Y.—Mrs. A. S. Pond writes.—Please find inclosed ten dollars. I have obtained for you two new subscribers, and you will please send the JOURNAL to Charles D. Nye, 21 Court street, Utica, N. Y., and also to Mrs. Hart, of the same place. The remaining four dollars you will please accept from me as a free-will gift.

BEAVER DAM, WIS.—W. A. Hitchcock writes. I this day received your circular, and hasten to send you this year's subscription. My last year closed the 16th of Sept. last, and I would send you a little as a present in time of need, but my health is poor, and I am getting old, and can not earn much. I feel that I am lucky to be able to send you this much.

CHILLICOTHE, OHIO.—Nelson and Harriet Kellenburger write.—Your last, the 12th inst. received, and am sorry to learn of your serious loss by the late fire,—but believing that a loaf of bread is more acceptable to a hungry man than words of prayer, we inclose a post office order for ten dollars as some evidence of our appreciation of your work for humanity's sake. You will please take out the subscription that Dr. Hubbell should have paid, and accept the balance as our contribution to help you get straight again. I am a pioneer here in the cause of Spiritualism, and the JOURNAL I have received through the JOURNAL and Banner have amply repaid me for any sacrifices I have made, so I put my shoulder to the wheel and help you get your light shining again, and I hope all Spiritualists who can, will not stand back but each will give a little pull, we can give the car of progression an impetus that will crush all the obstacles that error can place before its wheels.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—Geo. W. Brooks writes. Inclosed is an order for six dollars; please credit me that amount from date; that is, from June 1st, 1870. I am sorry I can not help you more, for I know how it is myself.

ALLIANCE, OHIO.—D. G. Hester writes.—I deeply sympathize with you, and inclosed I send you draft of twenty-five dollars. I learned on yesterday that my old and esteemed friend, Clark Prescott, was in debt for the JOURNAL, and as he is a very poor man, and in very bad health, and no prospect of his being any better soon, I therefore wish to pay his indebtedness to you, and also one year in advance, and the remainder you will please accept as a donation. Although I am a stranger to you I feel pretty well acquainted with you, inasmuch as I have been a reader of the JOURNAL for several years. My wife, Sarah H. Hester, has been a subscriber for several years, and we have ever found the JOURNAL a welcome visitor. About the 4th inst. I forwarded by mail three dollars, to renew my wife's subscription one year from Oct. 7th, 1871. If you have not received my letter, together with the three dollars, please inform me by return mail, and I will forward the amount at once.

WESTFIELD, N. Y.—J. Tinney writes.—Inclosed find ten dollars, three as S. Ward's subscription for the JOURNAL one year, three to renew my subscription for 1872, and the balance please accept as a small donation from me. Would be glad to divide with the poor ones who have been afflicted in this great conflagration and destruction of the once beautiful city of Chicago,—the great admired metropolis of the world. We feel the great loss here, and it will be felt throughout the great West, but with the generous and open hand of humanity coming to the rescue, I hope the day is not far distant when Chicago, the beautiful Chicago, will rise again in more splendor than before. The man who does not feel to aid and help under such circumstances as these, is not worthy of belonging to the race of humanity.

JANESVILLE, MICH.—F. Kies writes.—I received your note last evening. I sympathize with you, being burned out myself. I send my mite to assist you in your good work. Inclosed you will find eight dollars. But I ask a small note in your great hour of sadness, that I may be able to continue your glorious work.

CARDINGTON, OHIO.—D. N. Freeman writes. I receive with heart-felt sadness and regret the news of the destruction of the office of one of the best papers in the land, the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, a paper beloved by all whose souls had feasted upon the heaven-born columns, and the favorite paper of truly progressive and scientific minds. I rejoice, my dear brother, in your resolution and willingness to establish our paper,—humanity's best friend. I inclose herewith draft for three dollars, one year's subscription, commencing May 9th.

BEDFORD, IND.—J. D. Thomasson writes.—Inclosed I send you a check for twelve dollars, and a list of several new subscribers,—good sound reading and thinking men. I hope they will become permanent subscribers to your valuable paper. We have the seed sown here, and although hemmed in by church wolves, we need good mediums and lecturers.

ST. MARYS, OHIO.—Amos Benton writes.—Your circular of Oct. 9th, was received day before yesterday, and yesterday I called around among your few subscribers, and succeeded in widely working this section, most of whom I found absent from home; but I have volunteered the payment for two of them, and the other two will undoubtedly send their dues, and advance for another year for the paper, in a few days. Inclosed you will find nineteen dollars and fifty cents.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.—Will S. Shoemaker writes.—Your circular is received. I sympathize deeply with you in your great loss. But sympathy is not what you need just now, without a practical expression of it. I am only sorry that I have not a hundred dollars to spare you. My heart is big, but my purse is light. I have paid for one year and six months, up to the first of November. I inclose you a post office order for five dollars. Please continue the JOURNAL. I will try and send you some more when I am flattened out. Hoping you will meet with such support as will enable you to continue the publication of the paper, I remain your friend and brother.

AUBURN, N. Y.—P. B. Bristol writes.—Please give me credit for the inclosed ten dollars; also receive my regrets that I am not able to make it as many thousand. I feel as much sympathy for you as enough in Spiritualists to put the JOURNAL in full circulation again at once. You may hear from me again soon.

FREMONT, OHIO.—Benj. J. Hall writes.—Your circular came to hand yesterday. Your appeal for help calls too earnestly for me to resist one single moment to assist you in your endeavor to rise above your present misfortune—and a great misfortune too, for it more or less affects us all. But I will do what I can for you. At present I will send you three dollars, to renew my subscription for the ensuing year.

FREMONT, OHIO.—M. Harris writes.—A few days ago I received the "little" JOURNAL saying you had been entirely burned out in the great Chicago conflagration, which I was sorry to hear. This "little" JOURNAL proposes to be the aid of its friends to speedily grow up into its former manhood size. We hope it will. We can not do without it. We will do what we can to aid it. The friends will help it. What I can not do in money, I shall try to do in increasing the circulation of the paper as also obtained one new subscriber for a year, and have one or two more in view that I think I shall get. You will please send to Mrs. C. L. Pero, Fremont, Ohio, one copy for one year. I will not send the money at this time, as I think I shall have one or two more subscribers in a few days, and I will send all together in the form of a post office order. I wish you abundant success.

ROCHESTER, MINN.—C. T. Shellman writes.—I suppose that every little helps; therefore I inclose you ten dollars, and you get in about as fast that you are able, you may send the JOURNAL to those who can not pay for it on my account,—enough to make it up.

REMARKS.—Many thanks, dear brother. This is the most acceptable aid we receive. Let those who are referred to in our brother's letter forward their names at once, and the JOURNAL will be sent to each for six months, free. All that will be required of them will be to aid in further circulating the JOURNAL.

CUYAHOGA FALLS, OHIO.—W. W. Moulton writes.—I inclose a six dollar draft to prepay my subscription for two years, from and after Jan. 4th, 1872, which will carry it after Jan. 4th, 1874. Please to credit, and let the yellow ticket say Jan. 4th, 1874. I am truly sorry for your great loss, but be of good cheer, brother, and all will be well.

NEW YORK.—Wood & Holbrook, publishers of the Herald of Health, write.—Inclosed find bill for books shipped this day. Hope you may soon recover from the disaster, and move on in a wider field of usefulness.

ELKHART, IND.—Mrs. Beebe writes.—On the 11th of September Mrs. Rosella Beebe renewed her subscription, paying for six months. The flames have canceled that. She now sends to you five dollars, as pay for one year. We would send you a thousand dollars as a gift, if we had it in our power to do so.

REMARKS.—Thank you, dear sister. Your one dollar and fifty cents was duly credited, and now we credit you three dollars more, and credit Widow's and Orphan's Fund with two dollars. If all follow your example, we shall soon be all right again.

GALLIPOLIS, OHIO.—Mrs. M. Alexander writes.—Inclosed is five dollars for renewal of the JOURNAL. You waited on me in days that are past, and I am truly glad that I can return the kindness. Words fail to express the deep sympathy we feel at the loss and great suffering caused by the conflagration; but we feel that the angels will be with you in this sore trial.

STURGIS, MICH.—George E. Gibbs writes.—I am in receipt of the JOURNAL extra,—stating your wants, circumstances, etc., also appealing for very noble and manly way for aid and assistance to start anew the publishing of the dear, good JOURNAL, which we prize above all other spiritual journals. I am a poor man materially, therefore unable to assist you in this trying hour. Inclosed you will find a money order for three dollars to renew my subscription; I believe your list of subscribers will be much enlarged—hope it may be doubled.

(NUMBER FIVE.)

Chemical Affinity, Cohesion, Repulsion, Attraction of Gravitation, Heat and Light Rendered Manifest by Chemism, or the Magnetism of Electricity in Motion; Hydrogen and Chlorine Gas; Parity between Extremes; Nitrogen and its Compounds; Hydrogen, Oxygen, Air and Water. Simple Experiment, Showing the Nature and Amount of Nitrogen and Oxygen in the Air, etc., etc.

Having briefly alluded to oxygen and potassium as polar extremes, and to the nature and character of the extreme compounds resultant from their polar union, we now have prototypical premises upon which to locate a comparative analysis of all questions concerning the interior life manifest in exterior matter. We can now see through this open and highly suggestive parity, the correlational source of motion in matter, vibrating between the equilibrio extremes of all dual measures of condition and relation.

It here becomes necessary to recur to, and make a few additional observations as to the chemism of chemical affinity, cohesion, repulsion, attraction of gravitation, heat, light, etc., as phases of magactism resulting from electricity in motion.

It is known that in ordinary battery action, the result of chemical decomposition is the electricity given off in the form of a current, and always apportioned to, and including in its circuit, the elements or compounds undergoing decomposition. It has been said that heat and light are motion, we should rather say, they seem to be the magnetism of electricity in motion.

Since we are about to embark on a revision of the general range of views popularly entertained in the premises, it may be asked in a general way, that we assume from analytic observations of the facts in the premises, that there is an all-pervading force operating through given measures of matter, which we call electricity, and recognize as the dual life counterpoised in all forms of condition, and giving jurisdiction to all measures of correlation. Judging furthermore from the nature of the facts observed, we infer that heat, light, polar condition, chemical affinity, repulsion, attraction of gravitation, etc., are all phases of magnetism resulting from electricity in motion.

If we fill five glass jars full of equal proportions of hydrogen and chlorine gas in a dark cellar, they, though characterized by thirty-eight degrees of polar diversity, being non-conductors, will not unite unless electrically disturbed. If, however, we pass an electric spark through one of the jars, the equilibrium of the gases is disturbed and a terrific explosion takes place; if a piece of spongy platinium is suspended in the second jar, its affinity for the hydrogen causes heat, and another explosion follows; if the third jar is exposed to a ray of sunlight, a third explosion follows; if the fourth jar is exposed to the diffuse light of a room, its contents gradually mix in a few days, forming hydro-chloric acid, whereas, if the fifth jar is left in the dark cellar the gases will remain unchanged. From these facts it is inferred that heat, light, polar condition, chemical affinity, cohesion, repulsion, attraction of gravitation, etc., are all but magnetic phases that may be called the magnetism of heat in motion, of light in motion, of polar force in motion, of cohesion in motion, of chemical affinity in motion, of expulsion in motion, and of attraction of gravitation in motion, all to be classed as so many phenomenal phases of electricity in motion, and all depending upon this ever and all-moving life-force of infinitude.

To study these wonderful phases of force, and refer them to their legitimate source, is to approach the premises with an enlarged humility of understanding that at once expels all the arrogant self-assumptions from our minds, and leaves us open to the tuitions and intuitions of our kindred and ever-yearning mother nature.

As already suggested, the production of galvanic currents results from chemical action, and the amount of electricity given up in decomposition is precisely the amount to be found in the current, and this current if released in sufficient volume and force, though passing through a cold solution, suspends chemical affinity equal to the brightest light or hottest fire. No current can be produced without first disturbing the electrical balance of elementary or proximate conditions from whence the moving force comes that supervises and controls all other seeming phases of force which follow entrain.

From whatever character of decomposition is derived, the electricity given out from the highest positive measures of electrical force is invariably attracted to the negative pole of the battery, while the negative measure goes to the positive poles—for instance, the electricity given out most freely by the decomposition of the zinc plate, is sent through the decomposing solution to the copper plate, which is the less subject to the oxidizing effect of the solutions, hence the current is always passing from the yielding to the non-yielding source. Thus, in the decomposition of water, the oxygen of the water is given off from the copper wire and the hydrogen at the zinc wire.

If in battery action, we employ iodide of potassium, iodine appears on the copper and potassium on the zinc side. Though solutions facilitate atomic motion, both heat and light may, as seeming phases of force, do the same, for instance, if chloride of lead melted in a cup be used to complete a voltaic current, chlorine is set free on the copper and lead upon the zinc wire. In fact all fused solutions of secondary compounds observe the same law of action while under galvanic supervision. We use the terms galvanic supervision to convey an idea of the nascent or changing state produced by the magnetism of electricity in motion. If an electric current is passed through a solution of sulphate of soda, the sulphuric acid appears upon the copper and the alkaline soda upon the zinc wire. On being released from the depolarizing effect of supervision chemical ingredients generally cease to repel each other, and are ready to unite again as firmly as before, if brought together under favoring circumstances. In like manner advanced thus to this point in the premises, we easily perceive this force which suspends affinities in one state it has established in another state, is identical, and underlies the whole phenomenal range of action present in heat, light and chemism generally.

Returning, however, to the parity of the premises presented between the polar extremes of oxygen and potassium, we see potash or the protoxid of potassium produced as a medium between extremes. Though this according to our premises would seem to be the blending of extremes, it is but a blending of those extremes with which our research has made us acquainted, and not the polar extremes to which our inferences lead us, as the extremes manifest through the polar affinities which evidently come from beyond. In view of the highly suggestive facts, let us make that step beyond, to the positive polar reflex of the sun, and call it by way of approximation electricity, and to the negative reflex of the earth, and by way of approximation call it oxus. These being the positive and negative reflexes of the two sources from which they are derived, would necessarily combine and produce just such a seeming neutral as we have in nitrogen. Nitrogen in turn as the median compound of such extremes, would necessarily give back its reflex to the sun and earth, forming hydrogen with the electricity of the former, and oxygen with the oxus of the latter, and these two would necessarily unite in the formation of water. All the facts indeed, seemingly tend to prove the fundamental necessity of such a class of correlational combinations in the premises. Leaving the facts and the premises to the most critical inspection of the reader, we pass on to the brief consideration of nitrogen and some of its compounds.

Nitrogen is a colorless, odorless, tasteless, irrespirable gas, constituting about 80 per cent. of the air, in a seeming mechanical state of mixture with oxygen.

Let us pour the contents of a glass partly filled with water into a saucer and dexterously place a burning strip of paper under the glass, as we invert and set it in; much downward over the water in the saucer, and we shall see the vacuum caused by the burning of the oxygen of the atmosphere filled by the water being drawn up into its place in the glass.

This simple experiment shows the amounts of oxygen and nitrogen in the atmosphere—the amount of oxygen consumed, and the amount of nitrogen left in the upper part of the glass, it shows that oxygen is supported of combustion, that nitrogen is not, and that they, in the proportions of four-fifths of nitrogen to one-fifth of oxygen, are in a mechanical mixture in the air, and together with small traces of hydrogen and carbonic acid gas, constitute the component parts of the atmosphere. We may also here add parenthetically, that this experiment is suggestive of a greater and cheaper motive power for manufacturing purposes than has yet been attained. I am fully aware of the nature and importance of the premises, and the advantages to be derived to the world, as well as the worldly consideration to be awarded the more specific expounder and applier of this force. Nitrogen, so far from being the supposed "azote" or life destroyer, is really the chief of all the life elaborators and sustainers, and as such, demands and should receive our most earnest and critical consideration. Though apparently inactive, with no affinity for oxygen, and sparingly absorbed by water, nitrogen constitutes the chief basis of all the more powerful detonating and explosive compounds, such as gunpowder, nitro-glycerine, etc.; it also, under favoring circumstances, combines with the various elements, forming the most valuable compounds of every day use. Though not very extensive in the earth's incrustations, it is found abundantly in the vegetable and animal kingdoms. And as we shall see on a more critical examination, it is the chief, grand balance reservoir of "heaven and earth's" interblending condition from whence both the vegetable and animal economy draw their electrical momentum.

Combining with oxygen, nitrogen forms the nitrous oxyd or laughing gas, that so readily and mysteriously brings both the mind and body under its supervision. Combining with hydrogen, nitrogen produces the singular and useful compound amonia, so volatile as a drug, and applicable as a fertilizer. Combining with carbon, nitrogen produces cyanogen, a compound that combines almost as readily with the metals as any of the accredited elements. Nitrous oxyd or "laughing gas," amonia and cyanogen will all come up in the future, in explanation of the rationale of nature's power, means and manner of individualization. We shall next consider hydrogen and its compounds, and after that inter-electro-chemical action generally.

Items from Lois Waisbrooker.

BROTHER JONES:—It is some time since I sent you any items, and items of fiery interest have since forced themselves upon the attention of the world. I wrote you last from Brother Andrus's home in Almont, Michigan. From there I went to East Saginaw, and found that one I had trusted with nearly fifty dollars worth of books had gone to Texas, and left me minus both books and money. By the way, we are told that the men are our natural protectors, but of those I have trusted with books during the past year, every woman has done the very best she could; but of the men, from only two out of seven have I been able to get either books or money. The two who have shown themselves worthy to be trusted are, A. C. Cleveland, of Marshall, Mich., and Lyman O. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y. The others I will not name just yet, but give them a chance to send my dues to Wm. White & Co., Boston, Mass., to be credited to me.

OCTOBER FIRST

I attended a quarterly meeting at Lowell, Mich., where I met my esteemed friend, J. S. Severance, M.D., of Milwaukee, and had the pleasure of listening to one of the ablest discourses I have ever heard. Her subject was, "The Political, Religious, and Social Needs of the hour," a weighty subject, but I can assure you she handled it well. During the following week I visited Corunna, St. Johns, and Lyons, having visited and spoken at Holly the last week in September, stopping with Brother Walker and wife, he being a Spiritualist and she a Baptist, but lady enough to treat his friends kindly, which cannot be said of all who differ from their companions upon questions of theology.

THE SEVENTH AND EIGHTH

I spent at Grand Ledge, Mich., where I met with Dr. Barnum, formerly from East Norwalk, Ohio, and a favorite speaker in northern Ohio, when I first began my feeble efforts in this direction. The Doctor has lost none of his power as a speaker, and I hope that he will come forth from the comparative obscurity into which he has retired, and let his voice be heard again. On Sunday evening, the smoke from surrounding fires became oppressive, and on my way to Lansing the next day, I felt the heat from burning timber several times, as we passed along. Tuesday we learned that every printing office in Chicago had been burned. I continued to hope against hope, till I could find it vain, and when at Milford, on the following Saturday, I saw your circular announcing yourself UNCRUSHABLE, I gloried in your courage. There is one trait in the character of Milton's devil that I always admired, and that is, his indomitable perseverance. But, there have been so many good things ascribed to the devil that he is really losing his devilish character. The last week in October

I CHANGED BASE,

Leaving Detroit on Thursday, Oct. 26th, and passing through the queen's dominions, reached the Empire State at daylight on Friday morning, not having slept a wink all night. But I have had to suffer from the effects of a violated law by taking a severe cold, which, settling under my right shoulder in the form of rheumatism, I have not been able to draw a full breath without pain since, and as to sneezing or coughing, for two whole days the thing was impossible. Such luxuries were utterly beyond my reach. However, I had the pleasure of meeting some old friends and making some new ones at the Gowanda meeting, the 28th teresting; till then adieu.

P. S. By the way, while you, through your columns, are Searching after God, and God's people, I wish some would institute a search after purity. Those who are so afraid of impurity, so afraid that it is "catching in their family," should certainly have pure ones for their associates; and this they cannot be certain of till purity has really been found. Who will search for it?

Gowanda, N. Y., Nov. 1st.

Letter from Dr. E. B. Wheelock.

BRO. JONES:—In your circular I noticed a fraternal call from you to friends both far and near, to lend their aid in time of need, both in means and manuscript material to aid in placing upon the wings a new born RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. To me gold and silver seldom comes in showers; therefore, so far as these necessary articles are concerned in commerce, neither fire nor flood can harm me much; neither can I aid you in this direction as I would like; but such as I have, give I unto you, and that is, be of good cheer, for however cold our philosophy, it teaches that nothing can be lost. 'Tis true, I seem to miss the weekly visits of the JOURNAL. Your readers, too, may feel the loss of a mental treat which to me is more significant far than the burning of cities, or even the crumbling of empires.

All rudimental and material things are made to dissolve. Earth's rolling years may cease—and herself in form be known no more, yet mind, the moving force of man and of worlds still must be and remain an immortal element in the realm of beings, and must survive the wreck of worlds and the doom of cities.

Lessons, important lessons, by some can only be learned by important events. If, perchance, the Christian world, by fire or flood should loose their Bible, what a chaos to them would follow. Ignoring, as they do, the law of all new revealments, of course, Egyptian darkness would be their fate. Mark, then, the advantage you have over them. Fresh inspiration from a thousand hills may pour in upon you and ultimate in a new and glorious gospel that shall go forth to bless nations yet unborn. Again, I repeat, mark your advantage over the fortified creeds of ecclesiastical councils. Though all Bibles were burned, though cities should rise in smoke or crumble in ruins, though empires should melt away like dissolving snow; and type and foundry should rise in flame and fall in cinders, the logic and philosophy of Spiritualism would be the same.

The great fountain of true inspiration would still be full. The hinges upon which swings the golden gate that leads to the Summer Land, are far beyond the reach of terrestrial fires. A million of Tartarian gulfs, all fringed with mountains of sulphur and crackling with flames vehement, can never disturb the haven of harmony and beatitude that is being revealed to man through the ministration of angels and "just men made perfect." Neither can rust, or time dissolve that crystal palace designed for man's immortal home.

Take courage, O ye Spiritualists! for I feel that fresh from the living fountain of never-ending truth, there will flow a stream divine, not only of temporal good, but also of celestial wisdom unknown in the history of human unfoldment here below.

What though the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL and all other papers should hereafter cease to unfold before the eyes of the human world, would that dry up the fountains of living wisdom, or bolt the diamond doors that open to the land—the Summer Land of our fathers—the realm, the grand realm of immortal beatitude? We answer, no!

Celestial movements forever ride triumphant over terestrial misfortunes. What though a planet were dissolved, a brighter one may fill its place. If the moon should cease to be, the sun would shine as bright. What if solar systems should sink themselves into eternal ether, would this dissolve the law that unfolds worlds, and make dark forever the central sun of the great universum, and make in space only a grease spot in place of the Summer Land?

Think deeper, think higher, O man! the crash of worlds can never break the link that binds the immortal to the immortal.

The Christian is welcome to his "faith in Jesus."

As Spiritualists, let us have faith in law—a law divine that in its own time will beautifully triumph over all transient shadows, and seeming ills.

Hark, once again! Methinks I hear from over the river the whisper of angels, saying, "Go to the wheels, the car of progress must roll on; brush away the cinders; clear the track, the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL must up a holy sacrifice before the gates of heaven's high cathedral in smoke and flame, is coming, again renewed in strength, fresh in the glow of new vigor, clothed with an armor of defense more potent than that of Goliah whom David slew before the warriors of Israel.

Letter from Vineland, N. J.

DEAR BRO. JONES:—Rest assured, you have hosts of loving, sympathizing friends on this side of the shining river, as well as on the other, and hope and trust those in the mortal form will demonstrate their kind feeling toward you, by a prompt and continued flowing in to your hands, of the great needful money, until you are enabled again to send forth the dear RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL on its glorious mission to the thousands of waiting, anxious friends, who feel that they cannot get along without it.

It was with tears of joy mingled with sadness, that I read your most welcome little circular, which was received Saturday evening. We should have responded immediately, but hoped, by waiting a day or two, to be able to send money for several new subscribers. But the dollars are hard to get and slow to come in Vineland, as well as some other places. My health is so poor I am not able to go out, but have obtained two new subscribers—money enclosed—and I am sure in a few days you will have forthcoming several more, as I have put your circular in the hands of Robert and Julia Fellows, son and daughter of your friend Mrs. Dickinson, formerly of Chicago, and they are making an effort to aid you. Enclosed find post office order for $14.00, $6.00 for the two new yearly subscribers, three as a year's subscription in advance for ourselves, and the remaining $5.00 please accept gratuitous.

REMARKS—Dr. E. T. Bussel is an ardent Spiritualist, and is now about to reap the reward—not only for his devotion to Spiritualism, but for his rare inventions which he, through the aid of his spirit friends, has been able to bring forth. He has invented a superior car spring, and will soon commence receiving some $2,000 royalty per month, which will increase from year to year, as the demand for the spring increases. We congratulate our brother on his eminent success, and hope he may live long to enjoy the comforts which affluent circumstances bring.

THE young ladies of this country now have the choice of fifty colleges wherein to complete their education.

A RELIGIOUS paper publishes a curious appeal in the following words: "It is asked of all newspapers desiring the spread of truth, and the destruction of error, that they publish this request and prayer to Almighty Power, that on the three first Sunday nights in October, 1871, there shall appear in the heavens a distinct light in the shape of a great cross."

The Psalms of Life.

A COMPILATION OF

Psalms, Hymns, Anthems, Chants, etc.,

Embodying the Spiritual, Progressive, and Reformatory Sentiment of the Present Age.

BY JOHN S. ADAMS.

This work has been prepared with special reference to the large and increasing demand for a volume expressing the sentiments and views of the advanced minds of the present times, and meeting the requirements of every species of Reform. It is entirely free of Sectarianism, of all the theological dogmas of the past, and fully recognizes the presence and mind-station of spirit in every condition of life on earth.

This book contains five hundred and twenty-two choice selections of poetry, with suitable music on each page from Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and other Distinguished Composers.

It combines the advantage of "Hymn" and "Tune" each. It is prefaced with a Classification of Subjects, and Complete Indexes of First Lines, Tunes, and Metres, and being of convenient size, is generally accepted as the Standard Music Book of Spiritualism, Radicalism, and general Reform.

Alike desirable for the LECTURE-ROOM and the HOMES OF THE PEOPLE.

"I think there is in the book a greater proportion—I think I ought to say a greater amount—of beautiful and truly spiritual poetry than in any other collection I have seen, whatever the size of the volume."

Rev. John Pierpont.

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A Book by a Woman, For Women, On Diseases of the Sex.

The Liberal Christian, says:

After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had of its class. It is not a long work; it is full of sound counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for anybody indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to this subject. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country.

Harpers Magazine says:

We wish the chapter "Confidential to Mothers," might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land.

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours.

Godey's Lady's Book says:

This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class that we have yet seen.

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Order, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but always in a Registered Letter. The registration fee has been reduced to fifteen cents, and the recent registration system has been found, by the postal authorities, to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL should be careful to state whether it be for a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

Papers are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names ENTERED on the subscription books, without the first payment in advance.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expirations of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, without further reminder from this office.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to 1 Dec. 1871, it will be mailed, "J. Smith 1 Dec 1." If he has only paid to 1 Dec. 1870, it will stand thus: "John Smith 1 Dec 0."

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

The Disaster that Befell Chicago—Mayor Mason's Proclamation—God Charged as the Author of our Calamities, etc.

NUMBER LXI.

During the past year we have searched in all conditions of life in our effort to unveil the Divine Architect of the universe. Some, animated with too much zeal for Orthodox ideas, condemned us for our atheistical notions, our utter abhorrence of the Christian God, and our determination to banish, to some extent, the present conceived opinions of a Deity! We have not, amidst the chaos of ideas presented to us by the world, faltered in our determination to present to humanity, if one exists, a personage or principle that controls all things. In order to render our search successful, we have traversed all conditions of life, penetrated the dark, damning, seething, heart-rending pools of licentiousness, visited the ruins of ancient cities, investigated the traditions of by-gone ages, and examined obscure landmarks, endeavoring to find some impress that betokened the presence of Deity.

In this city Mayor Mason issued a proclamation recommending that all the inhabitants observe the 28th ult., as a day of humiliation and prayer. Among other very proper reasons for this course, His Honor suggests that we should humiliate ourselves "for those past offenses against Almighty God to which these severe afflictions were doubtless intended to lead our mind."

Mayor Mason intimates in his proclamation, that we have committed grave offenses against Almighty God, but fails to state their nature or the circumstances under which they were enacted. He appears to have a complete conception of Deity, understands his nature, appreciates fully his desires, and consequently advises humiliation and prayer. Well may humanity inquire into the nature of this God, who, in 1835, applied the torch to the city of New York and caused six hundred and forty-eight houses to be burned; who, in 1666, caused London to burn with lurid flames, spreading devastation and ruin over four hundred and thirty-six acres; who, in 1851, sent torches from the infernal regions and almost entirely consumed San Francisco, causing a destruction of property amounting to $4,000,000; who, in 1852, leveled to ashes the fair city of Sacramento; and who, still actuated with a fiendish, devilish, hateful, arrogant spirit, in this modern age of civilization applied the spark to the little town of Brussels, Pa., and before its destructive march, many houses were burned, and human life destroyed. Ah! this God whom Mayor Mason admires, shall we worship him, bend the knee to him, pay him homage, thank him for the ruin and devastation that he has caused, the homes he has rendered desolate, the hearts he has broken, the cry of anguish he has caused? Go with us to Peshtigo—God in his wrath destroyed it in one night, and twelve hundred people, it is said, were burned. Fearful calamity, heart-rending scene! "God is no respecter of persons." Before the march of his Fire Fiend, cities were laid in ruins. Listen! we hear a prayer! Yea, the Sherman House of Chicago stands before us surrounded with dense smoke and fire. See the angry flames enveloping it, caressing it with ten thousand fiendish serpents that seem to have come from pandemonium. In one room in the west part of the building is an old man, bowing in prayer. All means of escape are cut off. His hairs are white with age, and with his head resting on his hand, he prays! But his prayers find no response—not even can he catch an echo therefrom from the world without! Pray, pray—but the flames approach him nearer, and the smoke mocks and derides him, as it sends its poisonous influence to his lungs, and he soon swoons and dies.

Pure, noble veteran in the cause of humanity, your prayers found no response in the corridors of heaven! The next morning his charred remains might have been seen among the ruins of that noted hotel. On all sides, prayers might have been heard. They came from the aged, from the young who were being trained in Sabbath schools, from all those who reverenced the Orthodox God. And while the fire was raging, and the very gates of hell seemed ajar, an old German lady, poor, yet intelligent and respectable, was very sick. The fire approached from all sides, and her relatives to save her from the flames, threw her into the river! What a scene, what tumult, what a wild commotion, and all attributable to God! While the ashes of Chicago were still hot, like a merciless vampire, like a fiend from hell, it was said that God was directing the flames in Wisconsin. Williamson's Mills were burned and fifty lives lost. The destruction of property on the east shore of Green Bay, was fearful to contemplate. This avenging God with his thirst for blood not yet satiated, with anger in his bosom more fierce than that of a thousand demons, goes to Michigan, and renders several thousand families homeless. While these calamities were afflicting the people, he sent incendiaries to burn London, Canada, Syracuse, N. Y., and other towns too numerous to mention. All this was premeditated murder, preconceived destruction of countless millions of property, a systematic humbling of earth's children, on the part of God whom Mayor Mason, of Chicago, desires us to humiliate ourselves before. On that day, with Chicago still smouldering in ashes, we did not humiliate ourselves; we did not worship; we shed no tears of benedictions to God! We didn't even "go to church." We glanced at his proclamation—read it, re-read it, and pondered its meaning well. While musing over its contents the widow's moans and orphan's cry came forth from thousands of desolate homes, and seemed to die away in whispers on the surging breeze. We listened—our inner vision was opened; and we saw spiritual things; and our spiritual ears caught sounds from the Spirit World. The fire, the Chicago fire! the towns of Wisconsin are burning; the forests of Michigan are in flames! Our spirit seemed carried back to witness the conflagration! The lurid flames rise high, burning embers ride on the wings of the wind, and are carried to the roofs of adjoining buildings. In the Spirit World, there appeared to be a strange commotion. The denizens there seemed to be cognizant of this terrible conflagration, and to those near the earth sphere, it caused the most intense excitement and alarm.

We will not allude to that in particular terms now, but leave it for future numbers of the JOURNAL.

But what of Chicago. Saith the Holy Writ:

* * * The merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies.

How much she has glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much sorrow and torment give her; for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow.

* * * She shall be utterly burned with fire. * * *

And the kings of the earth * * * shall bewail her, and lament for her when they shall see the smoke of her burning.

Standing afar off for fear of her torment and saying, Alas, alas, that great city, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come.

And the merchants of the earth shall weep, and mourn over her, for no man buyeth their merchandise any more:

The merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all thyne wood, and all manner vessels of ivory, and all manner vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble.

And saying, Alas, alas, that great city, that was clothed in purple and fine linen, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls!

For in one hour so great riches is come to naught. And every ship master, and all the company in ship, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stood afar off.

And cried when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city! And they cast dust on their heads, and cried, weeping and wailing, saying, Alas, alas, that great city wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea by reason of her costliness, for in one hour she is made desolate.

According to the proclamation of Mayor Mason, the above is paralleled in Chicago, and under the impulse thereof he sends forth to this city his recommendations for one day of humiliation and prayer. What does this signify? Did God cause this fire, which exceeded that of Moscow, Constantinople, or of London?—did he apply the torch thereto, direct the course of the wind, govern the pathway of the Fire Fiend? The New York Independent says in the following language:

Chicago—incomparable in her magic industry, enterprise and growth; unapproachable in her calamity!

Pen can not express the horror of that fearful Sunday night, that more fearful Monday; and even as we write on Tuesday the destruction is unstayed. Sunday morning Chicago was the fairest as she was the most audacious city on the continent. Built up from creamy quarries, lifted like a sudden exhalation, as if from the magic host of some mighty Mulcifer, and solid, it seemed, and secure, except from the visitation of God, it has sunk down into the earth—wood, brick, stone and iron—under his visitation in the most terrible fiery ruin that history recounts!

Yes, Chicago, the Queen of the Lakes, the receptacle for the golden grain of millions of farms, the grand center of a vast trade, and the happy homes of thousands whose enterprise scintillates all over the world, whose influence is felt in England, in Paris, in Italy,—everywhere, on all the lakes and seas,—has been crippled,—but from these ashes, this debris, shall arise a New Chicago, grander in design, more brilliant in commercial pursuits, more audacious in building railroads, grain elevators, tunnels, parks, etc.,—until she shall stand forth, not only the Queen of the Lakes, but the Queen of the World! Clear the track—the shrill whistle is sounding, the Car of Enterprise is coming! Stately buildings are rising grandly from the ruins, and the time will be so short between Chicago in ruins, and Chicago rebuilt, that no one in the future will ever allude to it. But we do not believe with the Independent, that the Orthodox God destroyed it. If he did, we advise him to rebuild it at once, to repair the streets, the sidewalks, and especially rebuild his churches. Poor Almighty God, sending your Fire Fiend to afflict Chicago—ah! you can destroy, desolate, render thousands homeless, but cannot feed the hungry, cannot shelter the houseless.

What of the Compensation?

As true philosophers we believe that goodness is positive; evil, so-called, is negative.

To illustrate,—the sun is positive, and his rays are always descending to earth, and yet they are often absorbed by intervening clouds; and to us the sun is so obscured that we are prone to say he does not shine.

To those to whose interest or taste sunshine is necessary, cloudy or rainy weather is a seeming evil.

Another greater so-called evil arises from a long continued drouth—a drouth of such severity that vegetation is dried up, and famine is a result.

A still greater so-called evil is a desolating war, like the great American Rebellion, in which cities and immense tracts of improved and highly cultivated lands are laid waste,—growing crops and rich products of husbandry and the mechanic arts are destroyed—hundreds of thousands, aye, two millions of human souls are launched into eternity by hand to hand conflicts, or by engines of war and destruction; wives are made widows and children fatherless; and, worse than all, young men are maimed or otherwise reduced by exposure and disease, to a state of living death, only to be ended after years of excruciating physical and mental suffering.

Is there a compensation for all of this? Is this a lesser good, and is there a positive good, that will compensate?

Again, let us turn our attention to the waste places of earth, and behold the savage roaming over the wild waste—the lords of the extended forests and plains; holding the soil from the invasions of the civilized and enlightened husbandman who would cause it to yield rich abundance for millions when hundreds only can eke out a scanty subsistence.

A terribly inclement winter, deep snows and intensely cold weather, deprive these savage lords of the few necessaries which he is wont to procure from day to day for his subsistence. He and his dependants fall victims to famine and frost—a whole tribe is cut off in a few week's time. Where is the compensation?

Again, look and behold another tribe, for some supposed offense prepare for war upon a neighboring tribe. The war dance is held, and under cover of night they sally forth, and in an unexpected and unprepared moment, another tribe is slaughtered, captured and carried into slavery, or tortured to death in retaliation for the supposed injury received, and to gratify the hate of the victors, and amuse their women and children.

Is this not an evil; a great and positive evil? And where is the compensation?

Again, we go forth, and in a rich and naturally fruitful and productive country behold a ravaging pestilence sweeping off in a single year, millions of human beings. Scarcely enough survive the devastations of the fell destroyer to bury the dead! A terrible scourge—aye, an evil that makes the stoutest hearts quail.

The preachers of all evangelical denominations, be they Christians, Mahommedans, Buddhists, Brahmins, or the devotees of the savages' Great Spirit, affirm that it is the scourge of the Lord for the sins of the people, and strange as it may seem to the thinkers, the very few thinkers that the world affords even at the present day, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of the human family believe it.

Such has been the preaching from almost every pulpit in America upon the subject of the great fire in Chicago!

There is no subject that needs light, that needs discussion, that needs ventilation at the hand of reason and common sense, more than that of so-called evil.

In this number of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL we have only room to say that the subject and its cognate branches will be discussed at length in this paper. Believing that the great calamity in Chicago, the northwest; the recent wars in Europe, the famine in the East, the wholesale destruction of human life everywhere, is not only preparing the minds of the people for a more rational interpretation of so-called evils, but to devise scientific and philosophic means for their avoidance.

In connection with this subject we shall discuss the art of building,—the science of rain storms and droughts.

We shall show that all subjects that interest and are for the welfare of individuals, are in like manner of interest, and for the welfare of nations.

That public works, which are designed for the general good, should be at government expense, even as rivers and harbors are improved, and light houses are built for commercial purposes, as postal and revenue systems are instituted for business, social, and for governmental support.

We shall endeavor to show that the destruction of the most humble cot up to the house of commerce and palatial residence, is a public calamity, and should be borne by government to the utmost, farthing, even as the indebtedness of government is scrupulously paid; and to meet the expense of the destruction of property by the elements, or from unavoidable causes, sufficient revenue should be raised by a just taxation of all property, real, personal and mixed.

Scientific research would thereby be fostered by public appropriations, and millions upon millions of dollars saved from destruction, and all interests but those of preachers, doctors and lawyers, would be subserved, as a result.

Science can produce showers of rain at will. Showers of rain would not only subserve the agricultural interest, keep up the fountains that supply the rivers that float the commerce from the interior to the ocean, but they would quench the fires that have made such fearful ravages in the forests of the great northwest the present season, as well as the conflagration that destroyed the business center of Chicago.

But enough for this time. These subjects, and many more, will enliven the columns of the JOURNAL from week to week in the coming future.

The Bhagvat Geeta, and other Books.

The above-named valuable work will be republished by the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, in a very short time—a splendid edition.

All of our works will be [illegible] as we can possibly get out the [illegible].

Widow's and Orphan's Fund.

For the last four years we have had a specific fund entitled as above.

The object of this fund is to enable all who desire to do so, to aid a class of people to read the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL who are unable to subscribe and pay for the same.

The appeal of that class to the proprietor of this paper has never been made in vain. About one per cent of the expense of free subscriptions has been paid out of that fund; the balance has been borne by the publisher.

All widows, orphans, and aged people who desire to read this paper but feel too poor to pay for it, on request, will have it sent to them marked F. W. O., which means free, and charged to the Widow's and Orphan's Fund.

Since the fire several kind-hearted people have donated small sums to aid us in buying a new outfit. The money is very timely, and we most sincerely thank the donors for the same. Money is hard to be got at this time, and "every dollar counts." But as we have often said before, notwithstanding we found ourself greatly embarrassed by the terrible destruction of property on which our insurance is of little or no value, even to one-half more than our good brother, Dr Child, mentioned in the second miniature JOURNAL we issued since the fire, yet we wholly disclaim being an object of charity.

All sums donated to us will be passed over to the credit of the above-named fund, and those who make such donations are respectfully requested to name the persons to whom they would like to have the JOURNAL sent free, to the full amount of their respective donations, and it shall be done.

If in any case parties making such donations shall fail to mention to whom the paper shall be sent free, we shall apply their money for the first applicants.

The New Physic Force.

Henry Ward Beecher is a profound man, a deep thinker, and a sensational preacher. In his paper, The Church Union, we read an article in reference to Spiritualism, in which the writer claimed that there is a new force in nature called physic (kzick) which produced the wonderful manifestations of table-lifting, rapping, etc., which are usually ascribed to spirits. We have heard the spiritual phenomena attributed to almost everything,—magnetism, electricity, od-force, etc., but never before noticed this new force to which the Church Union alludes, as connected therewith.

We have seen its peculiar power manifested in Hembold's Mandrake Pills, also beautifully illustrated by Ayer's Cathartic mixture, and we presume the author of that article on physic force had taken a dose as a preparatory measure to illuminate his mind on the philosophy of Spiritualism. This new theory of the Church Union may succeed in moving the bowels, but could not stir in the least a rickety old table.

The new force, to which The Church Union alludes, and which is put up in small boxes, has attracted a great deal of attention lately among scientific men. Prof. Crookes, of England, seems to be the principal luminary in this investigation, and aided by The Church Union, so ably edited by Henry Ward Beecher, the prospects are very favorable for having this new article put up in a concentrated form, and for sale in all our drug stores. With Horace Greeley's knowledge of agriculture, who, when asked the best way to raise strawberries, said he always preferred to raise them to his mouth, and Mr. Beecher's "physic" force, put up in small boxes, to produce spiritual manifestations, the time is not far distant when our country will be considered far ahead of Europe in science, and even so far ahead of itself that the millennium will be ushered in at once, with headquarters for religion at the Plymouth Church in Brooklyn, while agriculture will have for its standard bearer Mr. Greeley.

Mislaid.

A Quaker friend sent to this office while we were absent in New York, a letter containing fifteen dollars, with discretionary powers for its disposal, which letter has been mislaid. He will confer a favor by writing again, directing what to do with the money.

Take Notice!

"Does the Spirit Leave the Body During Natural Sleep or Trance?"

Mrs. M. J. WILCOXSON is the author of the article under the above head, on the 6th page. It is well worthy of a careful perusal.

A SMILE may be bright though the heart be sad,—just as the rainbow is beautiful in the air above while beneath is the moaning of the sea.

Greeting.

EDITOR RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL: A long time has intervened since I last addressed you and your readers. And what startling changes have occurred during the interval! Hearts have throbbed quicker under stimulated emotions of love and hope; of sad, sad disappointments. Misfortune and death have overtaken many noble, yearning and faithful children of God. Earthquakes, tidal-waves, tornados, whirlpools, whirlwinds, lightning, fires and disease have devastated city, town, country and people. The great commercial centre of the North-West has been swept from the "face of the earth," so far as its business centre is concerned. Villages, towns and neighborhoods of various North-Western States, have suffered likewise. The "Destroying Angel" has accomplished a mighty and heart-rending work during the last twenty-two months.

What heart moans; what tears of anguish and groans of agony have ascended to the angel spheres, and sympathetically vibrated angel consciousness amid all this devastation and heart-rending sorrow of human souls! And what a quickening of the "better nature;" the higher and nobler emotions of our soul has resulted therefrom; thus exemplifying the great and eternal law of compensation! While losses and suffering are immense, the compensations are incalculable! These great afflictions, indeed bring to the surface the underlying good of human nature; that good which shall, by the slow, tedious and painful processes of purification, through fire and sulfer-ing, rise uppermost in human purpose and action, and bring the golden era of golden love, sympathy, charity, tolerance and exact justice, which all desire and which will lift humanity upon a plane of millennial possibilities. No pardon or salvation; but purification through life experiences, in sunshine and cloud, in suffering and compensating consolation. And all this without special interference of God or devil; angel of light or angel of darkness; though often with interference of spirits of human individuality, both of good and bad impulses, as also of those embodied and disembodied—all finally assisting the work of progression; the purification of human emotions; the glorification of man, and, hence, of nature and God. What bright lessons may be drawn from these terrible experiences.

But you, Brother Jones, have suffered in the destruction of your Publishing House, and the necessary delay in publishing the good RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, and your readers have been compelled to forego their usual mental and Spiritual food, which its columns regularly and so ably and acceptably served up to them. But only a short time will intervene ere compensation will be recognized by all—the paper and its proprietor, by increased patronage and closer and warmer sympathies; the readers, by the improved typography and matter which will adorn its folds, as well as compensating return-waves of confidence, good will and sympathies, which will pulsate the nobler and better emotions of each and all. Then, while we cannot rejoice because of the fire, we must feel a reverent thankfulness because of the compensating good which shall result therefrom.

Since my call at your office, ten days before the fire, I have attended two State Conventions of Spiritualists—that of Iowa, at Iowa Falls, the 6th, 7th and 8th of Oct. ult., and that of Minnesota, at Faribault, 27th, 28th and 29th of same month. At both were earnest, brave and good men and women, who dare stand up for the stripling youth, Modern Spiritualism; the purifier—not savior—of religious perceptions and purposes—the sifting of truth from error, and the herald of a Natural Religion upon earth. Warm hearts and smiling faces greeted me at both of these good conventions, as well as in the many places I have visited. No matter though an occasional scowl meet my approaches, these only serve to make the sunshine of the opposite more warming and appreciable. Thus comes in compensation again.

Ever will compensation fold her mantle of love around each heart, and with sympathy's purest gold burnish the crown of each actor's part. J. K. BAILEY.

Eyota, Minn., Nov. 1st, 1871.

To Spiritual Associations.

Our well-known brother, D. P. Kayner M. D., Clairvoyant Physician, of St. Charles, Ill., is shaping his business to enable him to respond to calls to lecture during the coming winter.

Dr. K. is one of the ablest and deepest expounders of the Spiritual Philosophy, as the readers of the JOURNAL have been made aware by his contributions for this paper, and the article in this week's issue, on Clairvoyance, is undoubtedly one of the ablest articles on that subject ever published, not only in giving the only full and rational physiology of the "Organs of Vision," but also the true philosophy of soul-seeing, or seership. He has been regularly lecturing in St. Charles during the past summer, with constanly increasing interest in his lectures, which are ever new and drawn from the inspiration of the hour.

Societies desiring the services of a competent speaker should correspond with him at once, to enable him to arrange his routes for the winter.

Clairvoyant examinations of disease, with prescriptions adapted to the case, made and forwarded on receipt of a small lock of the patient's hair, and $3.

Disappointed.

We confess to being a little disappointed at not hearing from a good many subscribers to the JOURNAL, who are largely in arrears. We have served them faithfully from week to week, paying out each year at least $2.75 clear cash to supply each with the JOURNAL, and now, when burnt out, we did think they would promptly remit. We say we are disappointed, and yet we have hopes that but a few days will elapse before all such as are referred to will respond with the "material aid" we so much need.

The Press.

Our thanks are especially due to our high-minded and worthy cotemporary, the Banner of Light.

Brother Colby, its editor, will ever be held in grateful remembrance for the honorable and manly course he has taken to promote the interest of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL in the hour of our calamity.

The secular press in various parts of the country are also deserving of our thanks for words of sympathy, among which, are the Daily Tribune, Times, World and Sun, of New York, and The National Standard, of Washington, D. C.

Items of Interest.

—Thomas Gales Forster lectures in Louisville, Ky., this month.

—The Society of Spiritualists of Kansas City, meet every Sunday evening in Good Templars' Hall, Cor. 5th and Main Sts. A call from speakers solicited. J. L. Morton, Moderator. Speakers and test mediums should write to him.

—Mrs. Mattie Hulett Parry is now entertaining the Spiritualists of Chicago with her angel-inspired eloquence. The hall should be crowded with attentive listeners.

—E. D. Babbitt, of Chicago, is now East. He is one of the ablest and spiciest writers in the ranks of Spiritualism.

—J. D. Thomasson, of Bedford, Indiana, sends us a list of subscribers, with $12.00

—Bro. J. N. Lee, M.D., of Columbus, Kansas, has our thanks for six dollars, two years advance renewal to aid us in our hour of need.

—S. A. McWilliam's address is wanted by Dr. Abba Lord Palmer, of New Boston, Ill. She was formerly of Richfield springs, N. Y., and moved to Anderson, Ind., last winter.

—Dark circles at a "dollar a head" have had their day: the abuses have excelled the uses.—J. M. Peebles, in the American Spiritualist.

Remarks:—So far as this city is concerned, dark circles are in great demand at a "dollar a head." Mrs. Mand Lord has been meeting with great success in Chicago, holding her dark circles, and the "abuses" have not "excelled the uses."

—The Golden Age has the following: "Our friend Gilbert Haven's extra Methodist notions of Sabbath observance appears in a very ludicrous light. For instance, he has just been saying that Chicago was burned on account of the city's sins, including particularly that of the Sabbath as a day of sinful pleasure, and to 'the brothels.' Now every candid mind admits that in Chicago, as in all other cities, the Sabbath is a day of particularly sinful pleasure in brothels. But it so happened that the Chicago fire consumed the most respectable dwellings, and strangely left unconsumed the district devoted to brothels. If Mr. Haven's premise is true,—namely, that the city was paulshed by God for its sin,—then its sin (in His eyes) was respectability and not harlotry; for he seems to have saved the Rahabs, who were harlots, and to have smitten the clergy and their flocks."

—The celebrated analytical physician, Dumont C. Dake, M.D., has located his office for the winter at Rockford, Ill. We congratulate the people of that city on securing, even as a temporary resident, this genial, whole-souled gentleman and skillful healer. See his advertisement in another column.

—We shall publish an article next week from the pen of D. W. Hull, on "God in the Constitution."

—The Hebrews and Spiritualists of Titusville, have affiliated in the joint occupancy of the synagogue; the former on Saturdays, the latter on Sundays. Mrs. Cora L. V. Tappan, of New York City, authoress of "Hesperia, an epic of the past and future of America," opened the meetings of the Spiritualists one Sunday with a lecture upon the subject of "Ancient Religions," to an attentive and appreciative audience. This arrangement, it is understood, was approved and advised by Rabbi Wise, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

—A. E. Carpenter has returned from his lecturing tour in Maine, and is now prepared to answer calls to lecture anywhere in New England. Would like to make engagements for the fall and winter. Will speak in Cambridgeport, Mass., the first and second Sundays in December. Address care of Banner of Light, Boston, Mass.

—"The Temple," A. J. Davis' new work, is exciting much interest, and we already have numerous orders for it. Shall be able in less than a week to fill all orders received and all that shall come in.

—Mrs. L. H. Perkins is now lecturing in Kansas City, Mo. She is doing a good work.

—Mrs. S. E. Warner, whose post-office address is Cordova, Ill., has been lecturing with great success at Ithaca, N. Y.

—R. W. Flint, of New York, is an excellent medium for answering sealed letters. He is doing a good work for the cause of Spiritualism, and should be well patronized. Send a stamped envelope to him for a circular, at 34 Clinton Place; New York City.

—Our indefatigable laborer and eloquent lecturer, D. W. Hull, gave us a fraternal call a short time ago. His head is full of facts in philosophy, phenomenal Spiritualism, and ancient history and theology, and he is doing a grand work for humanity. The substantial food that emanates from his mind would please a Chicago audience, and we hope at no distant day to see him engaged here.

—Our readers will do well to notice the work advertised by Dr. Andrew Stone, of the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute. It aims at developing a new and progressive system of practice, based upon the laws of vital magnetism and vital principles, and so plainly defined that all can adopt the practice at their homes with success and satisfaction.

—Dr. J. K. Bailey is working eastward through Wisconsin, entering that State at La Crosse. He desires engagements to speak on terms of reasonable compensation. He has delivered courses of lectures during this trip west, at Parkersburgh, Chester, Waverly, and near Charles City, Iowa, and at Eyota, Minn., besides attending the State conventions of both those States. His lectures have given general satisfaction, and he is doing a good work. Address P. O. Box 394, La Porte, Ind.

—F. L. Cummings is lecturing in Minnesota, and doing a good work for the Harmonial Philosophy. He is considered an excellent test medium.

—Mrs. Susie M. Johnson is holding forth at Sturgis, Mich. Her ministrations were well received in Chicago, and we hope to have her here again soon.

—T. B. Taylor, A.M., M.D., proprietor of the Electro-Magnetic and Surgical Institute, at Butler, Mo., is now healing the sick and lecturing at Topeka, Kan., where he will remain several weeks.

—Mrs. A. E. Mossop, whose ministrations were so well received here, is now at Battle Creek, Mich.

—E. S. TAYLOR sends renewal of his subscription, but gives no P. O. address.

—"The Debatable Land." This last work of Hon. Robert Dale Owen will not be published until the 28th of this month, being delayed a few days in order that it may be issued on the same day in London and New York. It is pronounced a great work by Judge Edmonds, Dr. Gray, and other eminent gentlemen who have been favored with a perusal of the advance sheets. We shall have a large number of the first edition. Send in your orders.

—Mrs. Ballou is lecturing at Terre Haute, Indiana.

—At the conclusion of his engagement at Music Hall, Boston, in November, Prof. Denton will visit the western country, delivering twenty lectures at Minneapolis and St. Paul, Minn., during the month of December.

—J. T. Rouse, the blind medium, has passed to spirit-life. He leaves a wife in very destitute circumstances. Those who desire to assist her can address her at Casey, Ill.

—Of the escape of Toledo, Ohio, the Toledo Sun says: "It is a matter of amazement to reflecting, investigating people, that Toledo has escaped the ravages by fire that has produced such wide-spread desolation, and made the year 1871 memorable in the future history. Nearly one-half the wells and cisterns of our citizens exhausted of water, the same true of the fire reservoirs, the escape of our city is a marvel, and demands of every citizen an especial Thanksgiving to a gracious providence that himself and household goods have escaped. Compared with Toledo, Chicago, and the burnt towns and districts of the Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota pine, were thrice armed."

Remarks:—We are searching for this "gracious providence" so often alluded to, in the hope to be able to unveil him to humanity within three months. The last we heard of him, he was burning Chicago, Peshtigo, and the forests of Michigan, causing the death of at least three thousand human beings. In this city he burned the churches and saved the brothels, preferring the prostitutes to the ministers of the gospel. This "gracious providence" is an eccentric creature, and so idiotic that he don't know his own children—the church-members. If Abraham begat Isaac and Isaac begat Jacob, we desire to know who—God or the Devil—begat the divines of this city whose churches were not as much respected by the late fire as the low dens on Desplaines street.

Statuvolence.

In our articles on this subject we have spoken mainly of the influence of the will on the physical body. A more important power may be obtained in the domain of mind and spirit for the increase of man's powers, the capacity for realizing true happiness, the formation of character, and the elevation of man to his true dignity.

We have seen that when this power is properly directed to all parts of the system, pain and disease are not only removed, but that strength which results from the equilibrium of all the forces is obtained.

Practice alone will enable any one to understand the great importance of these powers on the physical plane. For more than four months we have been able to keep away the pain from our poisoned hand, although at times it has been quite swollen, owing to the imperfect tissues that have been deposited during the past four years, and there have been all the symptoms of inflammation except pain. Every well-directed act of the will gives us strength, whilst all carelessness and indifference is followed by a corresponding loss. All training and gymnastic exercises are valuable, because they bring into action the will. We have compared the human system to a machine, a steam engine, for instance. A good engineer always loves his engine; he watches and cares for every part of it, and in proportion as he does this will it perform its mission in the best and safest manner.

Our physical organizations are more perfect and beautiful than anything which the ingenuity of man has devised. Let us then, emulate the example of the good engineer, and take all the care we can of these wonderfully and fearfully made bodies, not only in feeding them properly, but in exercising them in every way which they are capable, so that they shall grow to be more and more perfect. By this means we shall realize a higher degree of happiness than has ever been conceived of.

We desire to say a few words on the influence of

STATUVOLENCE ON THE MENTAL AND SPIRITUAL NATURES OF MAN.

Temptations have been compared to a bird flying through the air over our heads. We may not prevent them from flying there, but we can prevent them from lighting upon our heads and making their nests there. When the body is properly trained, we are in a much better condition to watch these flying thoughts that come around us, and keep them from entering our minds. To clothe a thought in expression, even to ourselves, gives it more power. We should never do this with any improper thought.

We have referred to the manifestations of the physical body during sleep as indicating the state of the physical when not under the restraint of the will. Hence our dreams may be entirely the result of physical conditions, and quite undesirable, except as warnings to us that we should endeavor to change these conditions so that in the sleeping hours the physical may not depress the mental and spiritual natures, but act as it is designed, in the opposite direction. We know that sleep in many instances instead of being "tired Nature's sweet restorer," bringing balm to the weary one, does the reverse of this.

Henry Ward Beecher says, "Sleep should come like a sponge, and wipe out all the sums that we had figured on the slate of life the day before, and give us a clean slate each morning."

The statuvolent who has practiced well the art upon the physical, will find but little difficulty in directing the same energies toward the mental and spiritual powers. As every evil act comes from a deviation from the line of rectitude on the part of the mind, and as these deviations always have a beginning, as by-paths leading from the straight road of virtue and right, we must determine never to enter one of these. We must say to the bird of temptation, you may not even fly near my head, much less settle there and build your nest and raise your brood. Under these circumstances we shall realize the truth of the Scripture declaration: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to those that love him." With every such triumph we shall grow stronger and mount higher.

It has not been so much for want of knowledge, as for this careful power of putting it into practice, that mankind have walked so much in darkness and in the shadow of evil, instead of the sunshine of purity and love. Let us then resolve to set our wills to work in the right direction and call upon God and the angels to help us in every department of our being. Let us seek for the kingdom of heaven in good physical health, in grand intellectual developments and, above all, in high moral and spiritual attainments which shall mark a new era in the world.

The religion of Spiritualism, as well as statuvolence, teaches us that we must work out our own salvation, not in "fear and trembling," but with strength and confidence, and the blessed knowledge that we are reaching new heights of wisdom and goodness every day, and we thus truly and earnestly aspire after the sublime realities of the future. Angel hands, strengthened by their will-powers, will be extended to us, and thus the mighty works of human life, which are one and continuous throughout time and eternity, will go on gloriously.

We have struck the key-notes of the grand oratorio of creation, and as we listen to their sweet music and fall into the line of harmony with these, beautiful indeed will be our lives. Clothed with a power such as mortals have never before known, we shall go forward conquering sin, lifting up the fallen, helping the weak and teaching God's children the better way, and ever learning more and more of the divine laws which rule in sweetest accord of harmony throughout the universe, and rising thus into this harmony, all the din and discord that has been in the world will pass away.

The will of man when understood, is the power that is to produce all this. Shall we not, then, seek to know more of this, and by culture and training bring it to the highest perfection?

For every evil under the sun
There is a remedy, or there's none.
If there is one, try to find it;
If there is'n't—never mind it.

Be true to yourself, and every thought will be an inspiration.

In the memory of an injury is cherished it is not forgiven.

THE superior man is dignified without pride; the mean man possesses the pride, but is minus the dignity.

Watchman, What of the Night?

A vast tidal wave of feeling has swept across the great sea of humanity within the past month, which has been fraught with lessons of the most profound interest to all mankind, and especially to the philosopher and student who would look beneath the surface of things to see the grand causes that are operating there.

Our brethren on the other continent are using the term solidarity, a word coined by Kossuth, and objected to by many scholars, but we think it is a good one, and more expressive than our popular term, "the masses," because it means the unity of the race; the oneness of humanity everywhere.

We know that mankind are one, more essentially to-day than ever before. The arteries of commerce have sent the life blood all over the globe, and the nerves of the telegraph have given us power to feel more keenly for each other.

There are no strangers on this globe!

Not an island in the far-off seas but holds some throbbing human heart that beats in sympathy with all mankind. From the highest to the lowest, from the most cultivated and enlightened nations to the lowest and most ignorant, the bond of union flows and grows stronger.

The external means to which we have referred, commerce,—with its white wings, and its more reliable steam, and the glorious telegraph, with its chilling lightning, are not all; there is a power behind the throne greater than the throne.

Spiritualism has revealed, and is revealing to us the grand fact that over and around all nations there are bands of spirits, closely allied together in love and destiny, and like these, the broad nations bands are not isolated as they were formerly when lands separated by a narrow frith abhurred each other. These national councils of spirits, great and small, mingle much more freely than do earth's children, and they are seeking to band the nations together and make us one brotherhood, by showing us that we have a common interest and a common destiny.

The facilities for travel on earth have extended the bonds of brotherhood, so, in spirit-life, where the freedom of travel is far greater, the opportunities to do this are correspondingly increasing, and in the more general mingling and interchange of thoughts and feelings there are great advantages.

In the recent wides-pread calamities, more terrible than anything of the kind that has ever fallen upon humanity, we have witnessed a mere universal expression of sympathy and practical benevolence than has ever been manifested on this globe. Humanity, standing upon a higher plane, has taken a grander step, that will lead it to a diviner position. The blessings conferred and the obligations sustained have bound together the human family more firmly and enduringly than ever before. Those agonizing heart-throes have sent a ripple over the great ocean of humanity which will carry healing and blessings to all nations. In the light of such a scene the littleness of selfishness, and the narrowness of bigotry are for the time lost sight of, and only the better nature of man speaks, and so he realizes a diviner condition than he had known in the past. A feeling has come to humanity that never can be lost; they may fall back apparently into the old ruts, but the divine draught that they have taken will never permit them to sink so deeply again. Every holy sympathy that is awakened, every divine impulse that sweeps over the human soul, awakens and draws out its native harmony, and lifts man into a higher condition.

It is not the giving of external goods, although the obligation rests upon all who can, to do this, but it is the feeling of kindly sympathy that really blesses both the giver and the receiver, and this all may and do give whose souls are touched and moved with a divine impulse.

Chicago will rise again, and in her resurrection will have the blessings of the civilized world upon her, and millions of human beings, who may never have heard of this city, and who may not know a single inhabitant of it now, will feel a live interest in its welfare. Upon the citizens of this great metropolis rests an added responsibility, which they can only fulfill by remembering the words of the blessed Jesus: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these ye did it unto me."

Passed to Spirit Life.

On the 12th of October, Elias H. Shaw, in the 43d year of his age.

Bro. Shaw has been an active Spiritualist for many years; was connected with Lyceum No. 2, of Philadelphia, for several years.

He was attacked with small-pox, and passed away after a short illness.

He died as he had lived, firm in the faith and knowledge of spiritual intercourse, and he has left a blessed memory to us all.

EXTRACTS FROM AUTHOR'S PREFACE:

"I come to show you Humanity, after attaining the loftiest regions of speculative philosophy, of untrammeled reason, on the venerable soil of India, was trammeled and stifled by the altar that substituted for intellectual life a semi-brutal existence of dreaming impotence . . . . .

India is the world's cradle: hence it is that the common mother in sending forth her children even to the utmost west, has, in unfading testimony of our origin, bequeathed to us the legacy of her language, her laws, her morals, her literature, and her religion. . . . . To religious despotism, imposing, speculative credulities, and class-legislation, may be attributed the decay of nations. . . . . Aware of the resentment I am provoking, I yet shrink not from the encounter. . . . . We are no longer burnt at the stake."

BY MRS. MARIA M. KING,

Author of the "Principles of Nature," etc.

This volume, as its title indicates, is illustrative of the Spiritual Philosophy. It is sent forth on its mission among men by the author, with the firm conviction that it is a necessity to educate the people to a knowledge of the future state by every method that can be devised by their teachers in spirit-life. Now that the "heavens are opened and the angels of God are ascending and descending," and men can receive communications from spirit-life, nothing can be more appropriate than for them, to recieve instruction as to the methods of life in the future state, and the principles which underlie those methods.

BIOGRAPHY

OF

VICTORIA C. WOODHULL.

BY THEODORE TILTON.

This little pamphlet is a brief sketch of the life of Victoria Claflin Woodhull, "a young woman," in the words of the author, "whose career has been as singular as any heroine's in a romance; whose ability is of a rare and whose character of the purest type; whose personal sufferings are of themselves a whole drama of pathos; whose name (through the malice of some and the ignorance of others) has caught a shadow in strange contrast with the whiteness of her life; whose position as a representative of her sex, in the greatest reform of modern times, renders her an object of peculiar interest to her fellow citizens; and whose character (inasmuch as I know her well) I can portray without color or tinge from any other partiality save that I hold her in uncommon respect."

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON.

Healing, Psychometric, and Business Medium.

148 Fourth Ave., Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy and sure remedial object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms, and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease, and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought en rapport with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the positive and negative forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

MRS. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the disease of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controlling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business, and trance medium.

TERMS:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $3.00; each subsequent one, $2.00. Psychometric Delineation of character, $3.00. Answering Business Letters, $5.00. The money should accompany the application to insure a reply.

First Principles of Human Action.

BY JOEL MOODY.

—:o:—

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the First Principles of Human Action, and clearly shows that without evil we could not exist. This work fully solves the problem, and unveils the Mystery of Evil, giving it a definite meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES THE MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD.

The book is a large 12 mo., of 362 pages, printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy paper. Price, $1.75; postage 20 cents.

THE LAWS OF SPIRIT COMMUNION.

By D. P. Kayner, M. D.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

The eyes are organs of "Special Sense," and are essential to the attainment of sight through what is termed the "visual ray," or in the wave of light reflected from an object upon the plane of sight.

The fact of the existence of a special sense implies also the fact of a sensorium, in which all the special senses are combined to form a general sense.

Thus, if there are five accredited senses, through which we gain a knowledge of things physical, these are so many avenues through which there is access to the mind, which really sees, hears, smells, tastes, and feels.

Confining our investigation to sight, we say the eye does not see.

Let us examine its structure and parts, and discover, if possible, the mode of its operations. It is in the form of a spherical globe, with two chambers, anterior and posterior, containing three humors, aqueous, chrystalline, and vitreous, and is composed of three membranes, sclerotic, choroid, and retina.

In its structure it resembles the camera obscura, which, in reality, was copied from the mechanical structure of the human eye. This instrument, like the eye, has its lenses and its anterior and posterior chambers. Like it, also, its posterior chamber is darkened; and, in order to get a permanent impression, must contain the sensitive plate. Now, upon the back of the lining membrane of the posterior chamber of the eye, is a dark-colored secretion, which forms the darkened chamber. Over this is spread out the fibres of the optic nerve, forming the retina. This is the sensitized plate of the eye.

A circular band of muscles, the iris, forms the pupil, and contracts or dilates according to the intensity of the ray of light admitted through the cornea, or outer lens, and in this way the picture is toned down to be adapted to the condition of the sensitive plate, or retina.

We have said, the eye does not see. What, then, does it do? It makes, or receives, the forms of pictures.

Light moves in waves, and a ray of light from any object bears in its wavy undulations the photographic form of that object, ready to be impressed upon anything capable of receiving and retaining the impression.

In this way, when the focus of the lenses in the camera are properly adjusted, by shortening or lengthening the tube containing the outer lens, the waves of this "ray of light" are thrown upon the sensitized plate sufficiently concentrated and converged to form an exact picture of the object from which those rays of light are moving.

In the eye, the self-operating nerves controlling the circular band of fibres referred to, take the place of the thumbscrew, lengthening tube, and operator, to a great extent, and by admitting less or more of the ray, adapt its effects to the condition of the sensitized plate—the retina—and a picture of the object is formed thereon.

The ray of light has now done its work. The eye, as an optical instrument, has performed its functions. The subtle chemistry of light reflected from forms, or shadows of forms, has made the imprint of the solid particles of those forms with which its waves were laden, and reproduced them in miniature by its reactions upon the chemicels of the sensitized plate.

In sun pictures, produced by artificial means, the subtle chemical changes which follow the retentive formation of the picture, have been lost sight of, but in the organs of vision their wondrous powers have but just commenced. And here we begin to get an idea of the complexness of the instrument of the mind, through which it gains impressions from surrounding physical nature, and acts outwardly through its physical covering. For now we see the ray with its imaged object refracted by the lens and vitreous humor of the eye, so as to form an extensive picture in the posterior darkened chamber, and its powerful waves broken up into innumerable little wavelets, and its shattered fragments throwing off or imparting to the magnetic molecules of the gray matter of the optic nerve their liberated magnetic elements, by which the picture formed is transmitted on and on, back along the optic track, back, into the interior of the brain, and inward and onward still, until it reaches the sensorium of the soul, and imprints upon it, through the magnetic soul waves thus set in motion, the impress of the object or picture formed in the "organs of vision."

We thus learn, that in order to get a vision of the exterior of an object, the "ray of light" and the "magnetic ray" are combined. But the physical eye sees not. It is the eye of the soul alone that gathers in the magnetic waves of the universe, and reads the objective lessons furnished there.

The eye may be as perfect as ever, and when a paralysis of the optic nerve occurs, thus cutting off the mind's connection with the "optical instrument," and the picture waves cannot transmit their subtle magnetic chemistry along the "optic tract," there will be no physical sight. In telegraphy, if you put on the ground wire, all communications to offices beyond are cut off. So, in soul telegraphy along the wires of vision, amaurosis puts on the ground wire, furnishing us the positive evidence that though the eye to all appearance remains as perfect as ever, the sight depends upon other conditions than merely receiving and impinging upon the retina the waves of light. The physical eye, then, does not see. It is merely the picture-catching instrument of sight.

We have also seen by the foregoing that the ray of light, as such, ceases when the picture is formed, and that the magnetic ray takes it up and carries it on and inward, until the mind receives the message telegraphed from its outer office.

Now let us turn our mind to a contemplation of nature, and we will find that every object, from a planet through all forms down to a grain of sand, and to the molecules that form that little grain of sand, all emit or throw off a magnetic emanation corresponding to their individual states and conditions, which forms within and around the atmosphere we breathe a magnetic atmosphere, more rare and yet more positive than that composed of oxygen and nitrogen, more subtle in its activities, more penetrating in its forces, and farther reaching in its results. It is the medium of communication or interchange between molecule and molecule, of reciprocation between forms, of intercommunication between planets and systems of worlds. It is the soul atmosphere which infills all, the light which shines through all.

Unlike the wave of light, which flows from and bears along the exterior form-particles of an object, this magnetic wave is the outgushing elements of the soul, and flows from the interior of all things, bearing the true individuality of the interior soul of each to mingle and interchange with others, and to impress its selfhood upon them and in turn to receive their soul impress.

The human brain is a series of magnets through which the soul acts in its outer temple, and receives intelligence of physical things through the nerves which constitute the five senses. But there are other avenues to the soul than through the gateway of the senses.

You commence to speak of a person of whom you had not been before thinking, and often when you think them far away, and while talking of them, they come into your presence. Something made you think and speak of them besides the five senses.

Again, you think of an absent friend, and your thought becomes intensified. In a few days you receive a letter from them, bearing date of the time when they occupied so prominent a place in your mind. Which one of the five senses brought you into rapport with that friend, and caused the thoughts they were then penning to reach you and attract your thoughts to them.

These are simple illustrations of the action of the magnetic waves of thought which flow out from the human soul, to mingle with the emanations of some other soul, whither the attraction leads. In the first instance the person thinking of you so impresses or infills you with that thought as to cause you to speak of them, or else, the only other way you can account for it is, that the magnetic emanations, or individualized auras preceded them and reached you in advance of their coming into your presence. These are evidence of magnetic emotions, impressions or influence.

Now another class of phenomena present themselves. Without any previous thought or knowledge, a fact becomes apparent to you which may relate to something yet in the future. Through which one of the five senses does this knowledge of unknown and hitherto unthought-of matters come? Or have we still another sense to add to the accredited five? We answer, INTUITION is the sixth.

We have reached to a point, now, when the magnetic soul waves outflowing from everything are beginning to be recognized by the individual soul, as it acts along the wires of thought independent of the five senses, or else, elevating them jointly to the plane of Intuition or Inspiration.

In this condition, the currents of the brain magnets, evidently, are jointly turned inward upon the soul, bearing in their undulations the reflections of shades that are gathering from combining magnetic conditions of events which form beforehand the picture of what is to be.

Thus, when the mind would act outwardly through the physical, the magnets of the brain are turned so as to act downwardly through the basilar, or physico-motor magnet, imparting to each one above, that is implicated in producing the action, the soul impetus or influence necessary to excite them to action jointly with the basilar. But when the soul powers are to be put into operation to act upon the universal soul elements of being, this order is reversed, and the magnets are all turned so that their currents are thrown upon the superior or spiritual region of the brain, through which, when in a proper state for the induction of the current, the soul can communicate with, and receive impressions from, "the soul of things," without the aid of any of the accredited senses in the usual manner in which they commonly act.

In this state, the whole brain, that is essential to the transmission of the pictures formed by the instrument of sight in the ordinary mode of vision, becomes a sensitized plate, and catches the picture formed by the magnetic wave outflowing from the interior of a body or thing, and reads the interior condition thus revealed, unlimited by space or distance.

This is CLAIRVOYANCE, SOUL SIGHT, or SPIRIT VISION, when the mind comes into direct rapport with the thing to be seen, through the magnetic lines in the outflowing waves therefrom.

Clairvoyance, then, is that exalted state of the powers of the brain whereby "the organ of the mind" is once brought into rapport with the mind itself, without the intervention of the special senses, and thus acting in concert with the soul it reaches out, along the pathway of the universal soul, to gather in some grains of additional knowledge from the fields of the infinite.

But though clairvoyance extends to the soul realm, it is limited by the capacities of the soul, and the conditions of its surroundings. It is only the manifestation of an individualized atom or entity, acting out a part of its individuality. It is the operation of a finite being in an exalted mental or spiritual condition, yet incapable of gathering in but a single drop of the grand ocean of infinity.

In other words, no one mind is capable of grasping, only in a very limited degree, infinitude. Each one is so constituted, that, if the true law of being was fully lived out, they would excel in some one direction; but none in all directions.

This constitutes diversity, and establishes the individuality of being, wherein each differs in some point from every other one.

But yet we are often told, "If clairvoyance is true, and you can see one thing, you can see everything." But how inconsistent and unreasonable is this idea. Can an individual see with the unaided eye beyond the "scope of vision?" Can one, with the aid of even Herschell's telescope, see the planets that are not in its range, or can they discover those worlds too remote from our earth for its powers? And can they, when by its wonderful powers they have discovered an unknown world, see its physical, social, and moral conditions, the climate, soil, vegetation, races of animals, with its inhabitants and their occupations? If not, then why ask that the telescope of clairvoyant vision shall reveal all wonders, or assume that it reveals none.

But clairvoyance is a power that reaches out beyond those of the accredited senses, as the telescope reaches out or extends the ordinary powers of vision; unlike in different minds and organisms, and presenting as many grades of action as there are individuals, each capable of doing excellent labor in their particular field to which they are adapted, yet no one competent to do the work of all.

Do not, therefore, expect everything of any one mind, whether man, spirit, or angel, for infinite perfection belongs only to the Infinite Mind, the great ALL-MIND, or, God. Do not ask too much for clairvoyance, or you will be doomed to disappointment; but if you get knowledge in any given direction, in advance of that attained by the ordinary modes of investigation, then, instead of blaspheming against the truth by demanding everything of the clairvoyant, thank, from your inmost soul, the Father of all, that so much light has, in the very nature of things, been permitted to come to you.

In religion, in arts, and science, it has pioneered the advance guard, and now is pointing that higher way that will lead mankind up the steps of selfishness, ignorance and cruelty, to that elevated condition of health, harmony and happiness.

Far out upon the spiritual sky we see the glinting rays of this aurora dawn, which the angels are rolling onward, and soon the full-orbed sun of reason will arise to shed the golden glory beams of peace and joy over all mankind.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

Does the Spirit leave the Body during natural Sleep or Trance?

Many writers on the Spiritual Philosophy contend that it does, and in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL of Oct. 14th, we find this idea spoken of as a conclusive one; and the author, who is one of our most active and practical Spiritualists, may wonder that any one should question the assertion. But we have often felt this idea to be a very grave mistake—for we cannot find in our own earnest investigations of this subject any support whatever for the notion. We know that when the spirit leaves the body at the change called "death," the physical form immediately relapses into the condition of inanimate matter. We know that if the intimate relations of the spirit with the body are in any sense impaired, in any organ or part of the body, the result is disease; and to restore the normal, harmonious, and healthy relation of the spirit to its vitalized structure is the first work of the healer and physician. To keep the soul in close affinity and harmony with its fleshly tabernacle is the object of sleep, as well as of the daily nutriment provided for the waste of the physical machinery. The voluntary action must be temporarily withdrawn from the bodily structure, because its additional wear upon this complicated mechanism, if suffered to be continuous, would prove disastrous to the health of the individual. The involuntary action must, therefore, for this time of recuperation, be left free, and is the sole province of labor, while the volantary retires behind the scenes. We are not disposed to dogmatize, but must be allowed to express our honest convictions on a subject of so much importance, as having become the result of long experience in these clairvoyant moods or spiritual states. And here we see that in the process of sleep, it seems the especial work of the spirit to build up the body, and at that time nature seeks to restore, by producing a perfect equilibrium between the two—therefore the notion seems most irrational and absurd, that the spirit can or does leave the body, at such times, and visit distant places. The "extension of a magnetic cord" to such distant places, even to other planets, this finely spun thread preserving the connection between the spirit and the body, is another most irrational idea to us. Knowing the laws by which the soul remains tenanted with flesh, we cannot harmonize such untenable propositions therewith.

But to explain these strange and interesting experiences, in which the soul appears to visit distant places, and roam about at pleasure during the hours of trance or sleep, is a very easy matter, and is on grounds that are perfectly logical and capable of proof. Innumerable, almost, are the cases in which individuals have, in a lucid, clear state, seen events transpiring hundreds and thousands of miles away.

Such was the case of Swedenborg during the fire at Stockholm. Many individuals, not capable of this clear sightedness in the waking state, are more intensely quickened and illuminated in the sleep or trance state. At those times there is an extension or vivification of the spiritual senses and perception. The spiritual sight knows no restrictions of material limitation or law. So with the spiritual hearing, and all other faculties of spiritual perception—allowing always that the conditions are perfect. The ripened spirit does not need to leave its temporary connection with the body, and push away like a comet into the depths of space, to gain a sight of Orion or take items of interest on the planet Jupiter, and certainly it does not need to sever this connection in order to visit the spirit-world—for, as a spirit, with all the potencies and possibilities of that immortal being or existence, it is not less in the spirit-world now, than if translated from the material temple it now illumines. Granting the intimate, harmonious relation which nature has assigned, as cementing the attraction or affinity between the spirit and the body, and thus preserving a healthy co-operation and balance between the two, this close relation still proves no obstruction to the free, unbounded sweep of all our spiritual senses. But we must conclude that the more perfect this rapport between soul and body, the more perfect will be the exhibition of our spiritual senses. The spirit which is not trammeled with the results of disease, which holds the organic structure in quiet, peaceful subordination during the hours of sleep, trance, or waking, does not lose aught of its inherent power by such connection—but on the other hand must be materially benefited thereby, or otherwise its condition would be a most unnatural and unfortunate one.

Now, for every assistance outwrought from material science, we are indebted to the intelligence of the immortal part. Our physical eyes are limited in their vision to the material plane upon which we are cast, and for the relations we hold to this plane in our close contact with physical things, and where we wish to extend or change that vision and adapt it to our desires, we avail ourselves of the optic glass or microscope as a means of accomplishment. We bring to us the distant mountain, the passing pageant, the charming landscape—aye, the countless stars that gem the depths of the firmament which we had otherwise never seen! We turn the telescope upon the silver satellite whose lustre has been wrapped in the long midnight gloom of the ages, and we learn that wondrous mechanism is reducing the distance, and bringing our shining attendant so near as to promise to us some day a full view of her surface.

We take the microscope in our hand, and lo! a new world of wondrous imagery and beauty, and life, unfolds its tiny portals to us, and we gaze in rapture upon the mysterious realm which our unaided mortal eye had never seen, which our imagination had never conceived till thus revealed. It was some prompting spirit which invented the glass as an aid to our doubting, benighted senses. And that which the soul or spirit is able to prove by actual illustration—that by which it demonstrates its own inherent capacities, should satisfy us that these powers belong not to the dull, cold, inanimate glass, but to the spirit itself. Thus, if a spirit can incorporate or embody in a material mechanism, the unfolded law of vision, we must see how perfect, how unlimited, how unbounded on every hand must be the truly ripe, unfolded vision of the unfettered spirit! Space is no obstruction—time no delay! Wherever the soul of the seer is conscious of an attraction, or is in strong rapport with other minds, there its senses will rush with more than the velocity of lightning. It may retain its vital, magnetic connection with the fleshly timepiece, it may even knit itself closer thereto, but as the light sweeps the heavens, so these fine spiritual rays of the soul, these immortal senses, defying the withs of limitation, will prove themselves as free as the light of eternity. Were the soul-nature liberated from the thralldom of superstition and false teachings, were it cultivated, even as we cultivate any rare, artistic gift, and were it harmoniously connected with a perfect body, oh! how glorious would become its revelations!

In our present babyhood of soul, we sleep in the cradle of superstition and skepticism; we suffer the arms of old error to enfold us; we close our eyes to all but the material, and never know, till by some transition, the veil is lifted and the scales drop from our blind eyes, what a grand, majestic realm of spirit-life and power is this floating in the little planet of ours rolls on in its orbit, and we push on in the development and refinement of our real life—the life of the individualized spirit. I sit here in my quiet room, a fine stereoscope, with its revolving set of copies, beside me—and in review there passes before me our far-famed Niagara; now dressed in summer robes, her scenery inspires me with all the delicious sense of that great rush and sound of cooling, limpid waters in a sultry day. I am, in spirit, there. I am oblivious—lost to all around me. My mind, my spirit is en rapport with Niagara. I am there—or rather Niagara has come to me. I turn the wheel, and here is the same Niagara in winter dress. Everything is touched by the Frost King—all locked in the stern embrace of the yearly conquerer—all but that wondrous cataract, which has allowed the frost to hang its pendants upon every possible point, and adorn her like an angel of purity in her fleecy white, but which eternally tells her story of freedom, her mighty sweep of power, to her millions of auditors who worship at "the shrine of the grand and the beautiful." Now I am there—and the sense of cold, the presence of winter comes stealing over me. A minute ago I was in that summer sense and state of feeling—now I am transported to zero. My room is still at a summer temperature, but I gaze upon all these iceboand scenes surrounding the Falls, and a creeping sense of that chilling, piercing atmosphere is upon me. Now if I continue this a longer time my spirits actually begin to sink, with this sudden change of temperature from blooming, fruitful, balmy summer, to the depths of cold, frosty, biting winter. I turn the wheel, and all the variety of its passing scenes, from the Yosemite to the barren steppes of Siberia—all the contrasts of life, "from grave to gay, from mirthful to severe," touches the springs of feeling, and carries my senses captive! O wondrous world of life! The soul no longer blind in spirit, no longer deaf, no longer chained, is a telescope of itself—a microscope—a stereoscope! It needs no material glass—no material eye. If it can see two hundred miles, it can by cultivation and practice in this domain of its being, see two thousand miles. And where then does the limit begin? In vain we may seek to define that line of separation! It cannot be found. On through the realms of terrestrial life, on to the grand, illimitable empires of the infinite—on to the homes of the translated—and on, on, with them forever!

Wm. B. Fahnestock to Henry T. Child, M. D.

DEAR FRIEND:—I regret exceedingly that we have had no opportunity of conversing upon those subjects which lately appeared in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL from your pen.

The article upon "Healing Mediumship," I am forced to say, being founded upon the animal magnetic theory, is as devoid of truth as that imaginary fluid or force is of an existence in nature.

Because healing by the laying-on of hands is the oldest method of cure, or has been a universal custom of mankind in the earlier ages, is no proof that it is truly a remedy for the relief of disease; and I think that the idea that "each organ in health generates more life force or vitality within itself than it requires," is as void of truth, as that it can be transmitted to others. That certain persons also have peculiar powers to cure certain diseases in preference to others, is an idea that originated in the imagination of magnetic operators, and only existed, and was a truth to them, because they believed magnetism to be the cause of it, and that it could not be otherwise. You must have had the same experience in the laying-on of hands, that all others have met with, and that it is a most uncertain method of relief, you have acknowledged.

If it be true that animal magnetism has an existence in nature, and that it has the power of being transmitted from one person to another so as to effect cures, it ought certainly to do so; but I have yet to see or hear of the first cure that has truly been made by the laying-on of hands, simply independent of faith or a belief upon the part of the patient that such a result would follow.

I wish, however, to be distinctly understood, that I do not deny that cures do sometimes take place after the laying-on of hands, but I differ most materially as to the cause of their having been effected; and the only way that a reasoning mind can account for the fact, is upon the principle of faith or a belief upon the part of the patient, that it will have the desired effect.

It is a fact, also, that cannot be contradicted, that if persons, whether sensitive or not, have no faith or belief that the laying-on of hands, or the bits of paper, water, or powders, said to have been magnetized and sent to them, have a curative power, I am constrained to say, they will have no beneficial effect, whatever; and the great mass of failures to cure in this way, will bear me out in this respect, and are too palpable to admit of a doubt.

This, of course, does not include regular prescriptions by spirits or physicians who have left the form, which, although they do not always have the desired effect, I know full well sometimes have acted like a specific, and being the result of knowledge in intelligent beings, and not of a supposed something that has no existence, I can understand why beneficial effects follow the former and not the latter, outside of faith or a belief upon the part of the patient. Clairvoyance may aid us in obtaining a true idea of the condition of the system; and spirits like men, may, when the patient is in a statuvolic or sensitive condition, impress their minds so as to relieve disease, but that they have any more power to do so than men, remains to be demonstrated; and I am satisfied that we will have to fall back upon the principle, that whether the impression is made upon the patient's mind by spirits, or at the request of mortals, the determination or conviction that they will be well, must be made or experienced by the patient, or no good outside of the power to keep the affected parts in an insensible condition will be experienced.

It, therefore, shows, that if we desire beneficial results, spirits, like men, must understand the true nature of the condition, as well as how the end in view is most likely to be accomplished, or they, like men, will grope in the dark for results, which, it is impossible under existing circumstances, to effect. It is, therefore, evident, that the only way to effect permanent cures is through the mind of the subject; and it will make no difference, so far as the cure is concerned, whether the mind is impressed by spirits, directed by men, or is effected by the will, or a determination upon the part of subjects themselves, independent of either, so that the resolution is made, or the conviction established in the mind is all that is necessary.

Reason the Culminating Flower.

We are sometimes told by persons professing religion, that human reason is profane, is not to be used where sacred things are concerned; but that is not the language of the Scriptures. "Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet they shall be white as snow; though they be like crimson they shall be as wool." "Produce your cause, saith the Lord; bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob."

Of course, we all understand that reason and judgment are one and the same thing, when authoritatively or properly defined, and this sublime quality of the human mind, this crowning, culminating flower of soul attributes, is appealed to on almost every page of the sacred record. Sometimes the term reason is used, and sometimes judgment; and why should not this quality of the mind be addressed and exercised in all things? For when we cease to use it, then are we proper subjects for an asylum.

We cannot perform the smallest duties of our every day life without this beneficent gift of the all-loving Father; then what does the theologian mean, when he tells we must not use it in the realm of theological investigation? When we banish reason from our investigations and conclusions, on any subject, we send the judge from the bench, the helmsman from the wheel, the sentinel from his post; then the other faculties would not know which way to go, how far to go, nor when to stop. Anarchy and confusion might reign, even in the affectional and devotional departments, faculties that, judiciously governed and restrained, lead by pleasant paths, and green pastures, and sweetly murmuring streams; but when reason holds no power over them, then they may become as the wild horse that runs upon the plain unbridled.

Shall it be said that reason shall not be trusted, because it is not always correct in its deductions,—sometimes makes mistakes from the effects of finite limitations; if that objection be well laid, it would apply with an hundred fold more force to the other faculties. We know that judgment gathers strength by and through experience in action, and that is an excellent reason why it should be brought into use at every step.

It is an attribute of the mind that demands to be used, otherwise it leaves the lifeboat with an unpracticed helmsman to guide, and the individual is very likely to be drifted away down among the maelstroms of appetite and passion, to be turned round and round, as between the whirling waters of Scylla and Charybdis, and sink amid the dark waves of human vice. If in all temporal things, even the most trivial, we need to use our reason, why should we not use it in considering those eternal interests, which in their magnitude and power overleap all mere earthly interests?

It is claimed to have been said by Lord Bacon, that "a potentate would not find much difficulty in ruling a nation, if he would only cut off all the large heads." And it seems to me that if a religious man can be persuaded to abdicate his reason, he is then almost a headless man, liable to be drifted, and used by the artful and designing for well nigh any purpose that may suit their interest or convenience.

Certain it is, that which I consider, that which our best interests would dictate should be done, as preparatory to the important change awaiting us, that should receive our prompt attention. Reason says, if we would take heaven along with us into a coming life, we must begin to create it in our own souls before we depart; reason says, in order to obtain that heavenly state of mind, we must cultivate cheerfulness, patience, kindness, justice, mercy, and tender compassion for the unfortunate and erring. We must live to the utmost extent of our powers the principles of the golden rule.

From the Boston Investigator.

A Sanctimonious Scoundrel.

The White Pine (Nevada) News of October 18 says: "He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me." The above quotation from Holy Writ, is applicable to an individual residing in this county, not far from Hamilton. This holy broth eaters arrived from Terre Haute, Indiana, eleven months ago, with an empty carpet-bag and depleted purse. With meek physiognomy, and optics turned heavenward, he discoursed on the frailties of human nature, dwelling particularly on the sinfulness of us mountain people. In a very short time, by dint of sanctimonious artifice, he wormed himself, serpent like, into the confidence of a respectable family. He became an inmate of the house, and put his heavenly "barebones" under the family table—offering up grace while the soup was cooling.

In the family lives a young lady possessed of every virtue necessary for the happiness of any one man. The prowling "hoosier" won her love, and last Sunday was appointed for the wedding to come off. Saturday evening letters were received by the uncle of the young lady, making inquiries about the "carpet-bagger."—The letters stated that he had two wives living in the States—one at Green Bay, Wisconsin, and the other at Terre Haute, Indiana. He deserted the last wife, taking all the available means he could lay his holy hands on—leaving his wife with five children to support, and destitute of the necessaries of life. We should be most happy to publish the name of this oily hypocrite, but the friends of the family have asked us to refrain from doing so, at the present time.

Letter from New York.

BRO. JONES:—We have received your circular, setting forth the condition in which you are placed, and hasten to do what little we can to assist you. Herewith please find our statement.

Mr. John Wait, a leading Spiritualist of this place, sends you $2.00; B. J. Barter, also a strong believer, sends you $3.00 for a copy of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL one year; I send you $3.00 for a renewal of my subscription, making in all $8.00. I shall get a money order here and forward to Chicago Post Office, where you can draw it. We shall continue to get all the subscribers we can. For, how you have suffered by the terrible calamity that has befallen your city. But I need not preach courage and patience to one who has passed through what you have. Oh, that I could send you more, much more, that would cheer and give you courage. We are doubly thankful that our Sister Robinson has been spared the awful suffering that must have befallen her, had she been driven from her home by the fire demon. Now, Bro. Jones, everything that we can do for you in obtaining subscribers for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, we shall do cheerfully. We feel it to be a duty we owe the Spirit World.

To our Bro. J. R. Francis, we feel that we owe a debt of gratitude which we can only pay by using our utmost endeavors to support the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL; OR First Principles of Human Action.

BY JOEL MOODY.

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the Four Primal Principles or HUMAN IMPULSES, and clearly shows that without evil man could not exist. This work fully solves the problem, and unveils the Mystery of Evil, giving it a scientific meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES THE MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD.

The book is a large 12 mo., of 343 pages, printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy paper. Price, $1.75; postage 20 cents.

A

BY

ROBERT DALE OWEN.

The Debatable Land

BETWEEN THIS WORLD AND THE NEXT.

By Robert Dale Owen. Author of "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," etc.

CONTENTS:

Preparatory Address to the Protestant Clergy.

Book I. Touching communication of religious knowledge to man.
Book II. Some characteristics of the Phenomena.
Book III. Physical manifestations.
Book IV. Identity of Spirits.
Book V. The Crowning Proof of Immortality.
Book VI. Spiritual gifts of the first century appearing in our times.

The scope of this book is broad. One-fourth of it is occupied by an Address to the Protestant Clergy, reviewing the present attitude of the religious world in connection with modern science and with modern ideas, touching the reign of law, human infallibility, plenary inspiration, miracles, spiritual gifts. It sets forth the successes and reverses of early Protestantism and asks their explanation. It enquires whether it is Protestant theology or Christianity that has been losing ground, for three hundred years, against the Church of Rome. It discusses the effects on morality and civilization and spiritual growth of such doctrines as Vicarious Atonement, Original Depravity, a Personal Devil, an Eternal Hell. It enquires whether religion is a progressive science. It contrasts Calvinism, Lutheranism, Pauli-m, with Christianity. Inspiration it regards as not infallible; yet an ineffaceable gift of God and the origin of all religions—a gift for all ages, not confined to one century nor to one church; a gift pre-eminently appearing in the Author of our religion.

But the main object of the book is to afford conclusive proof, aside from historical evidence, of immortality. It shows that we of to-day have the same evidence on that subject as the Apostles had. More than half the volume consists of narratives in proof of this—narratives that will seem marvellous—incredible, at first sight, to many—yet which are sustained by evidence as strong as that which daily determines, in our courts of law, the life and death of men.

This book affirms that the strongest of all historical evidences for Modern Spiritualism are found in the Gospels, and that the strongest of all proof going to substantiate the Gospel narrative are found in the phenomena of Spiritualism, rationally interpreted: Christianity, freed from alien creeds, sustaining Spiritualism; and enlightened Spiritualism sustaining Christianity.

Finally, the author gives his conception of the foundation-motive of Christian morality and spiritual progress, as set forth by Christ himself.

It is a book eminently suited to an era like the present, when the Debatable Land of morals and religion is freely explored, and when men are disposed to prove all things ere they hold fast to that which is good.

A large, handsome volume, beautifully printed and bound.

Price, $2,00; postage free.

BY..... .....E. V. WILSON.

A Wonderful Test at Des Moines,

Last night we were reading character and giving tests through the nervo-magnetic law of spirit control, in Spiritual Hall. After reading a skeptic very correctly, he asked, "Will you read a man of my selection?"

"Yes;" we replied.

"Then read this man on my left."

"We will, in good time."

After reading the life lines of several strangers, we stepped to the man pointed out, and asked him to lay the fingers of his right hand on the fingers of our right hand—not touching our hand with his thumb. This was done. The man was tall, spare, dark in face and hair, was nervous, billious, sanguine in temperament; his touch to us was cold and viscous. He was about thirty-three years of age, and outwardly appeared to be a man of medium understanding. The reading was as follows:

From 12 to 16 years of age, this man was under strong and powerful religious influences; at 17 there is a change,—he becomes a thinker. From then till now, he has been religious in the observance of truth, law, nature and science, valuing the speculations of men only as they are sustained by law and nature's truth. He cannot sit under the speaking of any powerful mind without being much affected by the argument and energy of the speaker. He is more than an ordinary thinker; and while he is religious in his observance of nature and nature's law, he is skeptical in reference to human testimony. I find with him at 17 years of age, a man stout, thick set, full features, dark complexion, dark hair, about forty, or five and forty years old. He is a preacher of the Gospel, a pretentious man,—very positive, and a revivalist. The action of this man has much to do with his present status of thought and manhood. He was a bad man, and his actions had much to do with forming your present position in regard to religious matters. He was not an honest man, and did not believe what he taught. This all took place far from here. What do you know of this; am I right or wrong?

"Repeat what you have said, carefully," he said. We did so. He answered, "In part you are right, in part you are wrong."

"In what part are we wrong?"

"You have made me a Christian, while I am an Infidel, and believe nothing, whatever, of a future existence."

"You are wrong, sir; I have not made a Christian of you, but a skeptic, in reference to human testimony,—religious only in the observation and worship of nature."

"Then you are right, sir, so far as that part of my character is concerned. I am the son of a Baptist clergyman; and, as you said, 'I was under strong and marked religious influences from 12 to 16 years of age, and in my 17th year began to doubt, and became an infidel,' but you are wrong in regard to the honesty of the man you described as a minister. I knew him. You have described well; but he was honest and earnest in all he taught, hence, you see, that you are wrong in your premises."

At once we felt an influence of a most marked and unpleasant character. We said, "Sir, we are right. Let us refresh your memory. There lived in your neighborhood when you were 16 years old, a girl of 18 years of age. She was very fair, almost a full blonde,—large blue eyes, full and very expressive; her hair was a light brown tinted with auburn, long and flowing; her features were oval, regular and well defined." There was a playful vein of mirthfulness ever present in her face. She was full of life and was the life of the company she might be present in. She was good and confiding. I see her in company with the minister I have described. He took her away from your place and never brought her back. She is a spirit and is here with you to-night, and gives me this history of herself, her wrongs of him that wronged her, and all I have said of you. What know you of this?"

Then turning to the audience, we said, "Gentlemen and ladies! We rest our case here. On this statement we stand or fall, and the only witness under heaven we have to offer in corroboration of what we have said is this infidel. Is it true or false,—what say you, sir?"

For a moment a wild unrest of excitement thrilled the audience; men began to stand up. The Spiritualists were exceeding anxious. Our witness sat as immovable as a rock; his head downcast, his face resting on his right hand. We turned an anxious look toward our witness. There he sat, in silence. The excitement was becoming painful, when of a sudden there echoed down the hall,

"Stand up, man; let the audience see you. Speak, what know you of this—is it true?" demanded Dr. Connelly, of this city.

Slowly our witness arose, turning to the audience said, "When 16, in my 17th year, I was living in Kentucky. When the speaker first described the minister, I had another man in view that answered his description in all things, save that he was an honest man and believed what he taught. Of course, this man I had in view does not answer to the man the speaker claims to see. I have no before me another man that fills the description to the letter. I know the girl Mr. W. has described well; I could not describe her better. She eloped with the minister described by the speaker. The minister came back in about a month without her. The girl's father called on the minister demanding the whereabouts of the girl. The minister replied that 'she was well, and at her uncle's in Indiana.' The friends of the girl at once wrote to the uncle, making inquiry in regard to her. The uncle wrote by return mail that the girl was not at his house, nor had she been there. This aroused suspicion of foul play, and the neighbors demanded an explanation, the minister refusing to give it. In the meantime the young people, and relatives of the young woman, determined to search the minister. He getting wind of the affair shut himself up in his house, and when they came to search him he attacked them defeating them, cutting some in a terrible manner, and then fled the country. He was a bad man. The girl is dead. This man has given a correct history of the affair, and I know there is not a man in this place that knows anything of this affair save myself. It is true."

And the audience were very much surprised.

I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore, amen.—Rev. 1, 18.

Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.—Heb. 13, 2.

BELOVED, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they be of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world.—1st John, 4, 1.

And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.—1st Cor. 14, 6, 32.

And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest.—39th verse, same chapter.

Resolved, That the New Testament sustains Modern Spiritualism. What Christian minister will fake it up. He must be a man of good moral character, and in charge of a congregation.

Mrs. A. H. Robinson, the Healing Medium.

The above-named, world-renowned medium continues to heal the sick, with marvelous results, at her residence, 148 4th avenue. Chronic and acute diseases alike yield to the remedies presented by her while under spirit control. Her advertisement will be found in another column, containing directions to those who write her for diagnosis and prescriptions.

The following are extracts from two letters picked up at random from a package of an hundred or more recently received from those he has treated, in different parts of the country.

John A. Taylor, writing from Middletown, Connecticut, Oct. 19th, says: "Mrs. Robinson, my health has greatly improved. Your medicine has had a better effect upon me than any other that I have ever taken."

Mrs. S. M. Pease, of Oberlin, Ohio, who has been for many years troubled with asthma and severe chronic cankered sore mouth, eyes, nose, and bowels, in her letter of Oct. 16th, says, "It is now twelve days since I began following your prescription. I am much better. My eyes, nose and mouth are well, my head is free from pain, and there is much less soreness in my bowels than when I commenced taking your medicine."

Spirit Likenesses.

Mr. and Mrs. Morelle, Brooklyn, N. Y., have furnished us with three different sizes of photographs of one of Anderson's likeness of the spirit of "Sunshine," a beautiful Indian girl—a guardian spirit who often entrances Mrs. Dr. Morelle.

Our sincere thanks are hereby tendered to our friends for the present. The loss of all of our spirit likenesses is more keenly felt than anything else destroyed by the late fire.

We have advice that the spirits have executed some fine likenesses for us at Bro. Potts' room in Harrisburg, Pa. We hope to receive them in time to make a further announcement in our next issue.

Letters of Inquiry.

We are receiving letters of inquiry in regard to letters which have been sent to us since the fire. We have no doubt but what all have come safely to hand, but it is almost impossible to answer at present. As soon as we can get our regular mail list set up, which is a big job, the proper credits will appear upon each one's paper. As soon as we can get up our letter case our many letters will be arranged in alphabetical order, so that we can promptly refer to letters received, and reply to inquiries. Until then our friends will have to presume all is right, which is doubtless the case in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred.

Mediums in Chicago.

The following are among the leading mediums of Chicago:

Mrs. A. H. Robinson, the great healing and business medium, 148 4th avenue. The Bangs Children, 227 South Morgan street. Mrs. Lord, 251 1-2 Park avenue. Minnie Myers, 169 4th Avenue. Dr. McFadden, 186 West Washington street, the medium that The Republican did not drive out of the city, nor did the fire burn him out, but who has a large house, with many boarders, and a little more room for transients visiting the city. There are a great number of other mediums, whose business can be easily found by calling at this office, and whose names and places of business will be put in the Medium Register as soon as ascertained.

Disappointment.

It is very unpleasant to be disappointed when we have just reason to expect a different result. Hence we have worked day and night to reinstate the JOURNAL. Our subscribers will find this number everway equal to the best ever issued. It is our intention to make every succeeding a little better than the best preceding number. Our object is to please and instruct patrons. In turn we hope not to be disappointed through the negligence of those who ought to remember that ready pay is all important just now.

The Prairie Farmer.

Our cotemporary, the Prairie Farmer, comes forth since the fire as fresh and clear as new type, new press, and clear white paper can make it. As to the character of the matter nothing need to be said. Its former high reputation as an agricultural paper, is a sufficient guarantee that no pains will be spared by its editors to make it in the future as it has been in the past, an every way desirable paper to the agriculturalists of the Northwest. Their Publishing House is now located at 676 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

Lost Papers.

In case papers do not reach subscribers within reasonable time, the better way is to write to this office immediately for copies to supply the place of lost numbers. If delayed we may not be able to furnish them. When we have them we send them free, so as to make the volumns complete to each subscriber.

AN Arabic proverb says: "silence is often an answer." Aye, and a grandly eloquent one.

FEW men are wise enough to prefer the blame that is useful to the praise which is hurtful.

"Angels are but men in lighter habit clad."—Dr. Young in "Night Thoughts."

An escaped lunatic afforded some merriment in Bridgeport recently. He carried a set of handcuffs and fetters, and claimed that he had been commissioned to catch and chain the Devil, and had come to Bridgeport for that purpose.

STATE CONVENTIONS.

Wisconsin.

The Wisconsin State Spiritualist Convention met at the village of Lowell, Dodge county, October 28th, and in the absence of the President, U. S. Hamilton, of Beloit, J. O. Barrett called the Convention to order. Wm. H. Green, of Lowell, was elected President of the State Association for the coming year. Mrs. J. O. Barrett was elected Vice President, and D. S. Woodworth, of Oak Grove, Secretary. A Committee on Resolutions was appointed by the Chair, consisting of J. O. Barrett, E. W. Stevens, and Dr. Samuel Underhill. D. S. Woodworth, P. P. Richerson, and Cordelia Saunders were appointed a Committee on Programme. After some remarks by J. O. Barrett, State Missionary, the Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock P. M.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

Convention called to order by the President. Singing by Mr. and Mrs. Green, of Barnett. The Convention then spent a pleasant half hour in conference, in which E. W. Stevens, D. S. Woodworth, Wm. Hoges, and Dr. Underhill took part. The Convention then listened to a very able and eloquent address by J. O. Barrett, which will long be remembered by those who heard it. Bro. Barrett is just the man for the place he occupies as State Missionary. He is an able, eloquent man, and full of zeal in the good cause. The Convention elected an Executive Committee, consisting of Wm. A. Green, D. S. Woodworth, Mrs. J. O. Barrett, E. W. Stevens, Miss Cordelia Saunders, Mrs. Hoges, of Waterloo, and M. D. Benedict, of Lowell. Adjourned until 8 P. M.

SATURDAY EVENING SESSION.

In the absence of the President, the Vice President occupied the chair, and called the meeting to order. The following resolutions were introduced and adopted:

1st. Resolved, That the glowing aspects of Modern Spiritualism inspire us to thank God and take courage.

2nd. Resolved, That we are convinced the Spirit World is moving in a power never before upon the inhabitants of this globe, as at no former period of its history.

3rd. Resolved, That the real cause of this extra movement is the increased intelligence and more enlightened and liberal views of men on human rights, and State and National Legislation, so that we may not be put to death as has been done in bygone days.

4th. Resolved, That we believe Spiritualism will establish a most glorious state of society, and that Co-operative Labor, Woman's Rights, and the International Labor Organization are working out the full emancipation of our race from king and priest, monopolies and poverty.

5th. Resolved, That the cause demands greater devotion and freer sacrifices of time and money, as the harvest is ripe and more labor is required than in any previous period.

6th. Resolved, That we must not forget the day of small raps of mighty import; but that circles should be held everywhere with singing and prayer to invite new manifestations and develop new mediums.

7th. Resolved, That we anticipate such a re-organization of society as will provide homes and education for young and old.

8th. Resolved, That the labor-saving machinery prophecies an era of light labor, an ample supply of all human wants, the triumph of justice, and reign of love your brother as you love yourself.

9th. Resolved, That the demands of right-ous legislation, the triumph of temperance, and the principles of equal rights demand the enfranchisement of woman and her vote at the polls.

10th. Resolved, That in the education of the children of our land we behold the surest source of spiritualization and development, and we look to the time not far distant when the religion of the angels be early taught, and Children's Progressive Lyceums be organized and sustained in all feasible places.

11th. Resolved, That we will with renewed energy struggle to realize the thorough triumph of the indications of these Resolutions.

Mr. Renton, of Watertown, was called to the stand and gave a very interesting address on the science of Spiritualism. Mrs. Hoges, of Waterloo, delivered a very beautiful lecture while under spirit control. She was followed by Dr. Underhill in some very able remarks on Spirit Magnetism.

Adjourned until Sunday morning.

SUNDAY MORNING SESSION.

At 9 o'clock the Convention was called to order by E. W. Stevens, the President not being present. An hour's conference was held, led by Mr. Renton, who was followed by Dr. Underhill and D. S. Woodworth. After which the President took the chair, and the Convention listened to a beautiful poem, entitled "Peace," led by Mrs. Bruce. An inspirational poem was read by Mrs. J. C. Bunnell.

Mattie Hulett Parry was introduced to the Convention and delivered a very eloquent address. Sister Parry is a rising star, and there are few in the country who excel her as a public speaker.

A collection was taken up to defray the expenses of the meeting, after which a recess was taken until 1½ o'clock.

Immediately after the forenoon services the Executive Committee waited on and elected J. O. Barrett as State Missionary for the ensuing year.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

President Green called the meeting to order. Dr. Underhill opened the hour assigned to conference, with some appropriate remarks on Spiritism as compared with creeds. He was followed by Bro. Renton, and D. S. Woodworth. E. W. Stevens then entertained the large audience for one hour in a masterly effort, giving a glowing and beautiful description of the religion of the angels. It was full of inspiration and true eloquence.

Mrs. Parry was called to the stand by many voices, and in a short, pathetic address of twenty minutes' duration she seemed to electrify the whole audience with the magnetism of her own soul. She seemed, for the time being, to rise above the sphere of the inhabitants of earth, and appeared more like an angel of light than a denizen of this lower sphere. Mrs. Parry then gave a description of the true work of the Spiritualist, there was scarcely a dry eye in the house.

On motion of Bro. Stevens, the Convention adjourned to still evening.

SUNDAY EVENING SESSION.

President in the chair. A motion was made and carried that the Missionary be instructed to report quarterly. Mrs. Mary Hoges was then called to the stand and addressed the meeting while under spirit control, taking for her subject, "Spirit Intercourse," giving some fine tests of spirit presence. Mrs. Parry then read a beautiful poem and followed with another of her soul-stirring addresses, on the subject of "Symbolism."

The Convention, after thanking the people of Lowell for their generous hospitality, adjourned until 1872. On the whole, the meeting was a grand success.

Minnesota.

The Fourth Annual Convention of the State Association of Spiritualists met at Faribault, Rice county, October 27th, 28th, and 29th. At 10 o'clock P. M., the Convention was called to order by President Bangs, who made quite a lengthy speech in explanation of our coming together, also on various points of our philosophy. The afternoon was spent in business and conference, in which many of the delegates took part. Dr. Fuller gave a short sketch of his labors since the June Convention, and spoke encouragingly of our prospects, spiritually and financially. Mrs. A. H. Bangs spoke words of truth. An old co-laborer, Father Pratt, who passed from earth-life in August, had a good his promise to return to our Convention, and was instantly present with a large number of spirits, and once, some of whom were not aware that he had left us.

A Committee of Arrangements was appointed to conduct the affairs of the Convention, select speakers, etc. P. W. Hanscom, of Minneapolis, Mrs. E. G. Carpenter, of Fan nington, and Mrs. Dr. Pope, of Morristown, were appointed as said Committee.

After a song and music by J. L. Potter, the Convention adjourned to meet at 7 o'clock P. M.

FRIDAY EVENING SESSION.

Meeting called to order at the appointed time, and all job ed in a conference of half an hour, we then listened to a lecture by Isaac Pope, of Morristown.

Motion that at 11 o'clock on Saturday an informal ballot be cast for President of the Association for the ensuing year. Carried.

Adjourned, with good feeling and renewed faith in our cause, to meet at 9½ A. M., Saturday.

SATURDAY MORNING SESSION.

After transacting some business, a lecture was delivered by Mrs. H. H. Fuller, of Elk River. She spoke of the necessity of an entire devotion to our cause, and of the good results that would follow if each one would live up to the highest light which Spiritualism gives to each individual.

An informal ballot for President gave the largest number of votes to Jesse H. Bangs, of Stillwater.

Moved that the nominations and election of officers be left till 2 o'clock P. M. Carried.

After a song from the good old Harp we adjourned.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

Called to order at two o'clock, when Jesse H. Bangs withdrew his name as a candidate for the Presidency. Upon balloting, Isaac Pope, of Morristown, was elected. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

1st Vice-Pres.—Mrs. Abbie Rowley, Farmington.
2nd " Mrs. Abbie Stapleton, Aurora.
3rd " Mrs. Sanford Niles, Rochester.
Treasurer—Sylvanus Jenkins, Farmington.
Cor. and Rec. Secretary—Mrs. Harriet E. Pope, Morristown.

Executive Board—E. H. Bangs, Minneapolis; P. W. Hanscomb, Minneapolis; Mrs. E. M. Welch, St. Paul; C. P. Collins, Northfield; and H. H. Smith, Osseo.

A vote of thanks was tendered by H. H. Smith, on clairvoyance, etc., etc. Bro. Smith has a theory of his own, in regard to mediumship and spirit control, and bids fair to be with a tenacity worthy of so important a subject. Adjourned.

SATURDAY EVENING SESSION.

Met at 7 o'clock for evening session, and spent an hour in conference. J. L. Potter gave the lecture for the evening, after which we listened to a soul-stirring song, and then adjourned to meet at 9¼ o'clock, Sunday morning.

SUNDAY MORNING SESSION.

A conference of one hour was agreed upon, and it was truly a feast to listen to so many whose souls were stirred by thoughts from the Summer Land, and we could truly say, "It is good for us to be here." Dr. J. E. Bailey, of Indiana, gave the morning lecture, on "Modern Spiritualism." It is a noble theme, and was well received. Bro. Bailey's manner of speaking has improved since last we saw him; and as he is constantly traveling and laboring in our cause, we hope warm friends will greet him everywhere. After music and singing, we adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock, P. M.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

The President promptly called us to order, and another heart-thrilling hour of conference floated away into the realms of the past. As is clear H. H. Smith gave us his views of the Bible. His lecture was radical, yet he struck so close to version, that not even his opposers could find fault with him. Adjourned.

SUNDAY EVENING SESSION.

Met at 7 o'clock, for the last session, to be spent in conference, and we had a glorious meeting. The house was filled with a quiet, respectable audience, who came to listen and inquire, as they did in Paul's time—"Are these things so?" The last lecture of the evening was by Mrs. Harriet E. Pope; the next, by J. L. Potter, State Agent, who gave the closing address, deep, logical, and thrilling. The Executive Board met at different times as occasion demanded, to attend to the affairs of the Association.

A motion before the Board that J. L. Potter be elected State Agent for the ensuing year. Carried.

Motion that Mrs. Pope be paid $15.00 for services as Secretary of Association. Carried.

Motion that H. H. Smith, Isaac Pope, and Harriet E. Pope, act as State Missionaries, collecting their own salary. Carried.

Our Agent gave the names of four hundred and twenty-five, as members of the Association, but upon careful inquiry, it is thought that not more than one in five or six who are real Spiritualists are members.

The speakers at Mrs. Pope's, who have received "Certificates of Fellowship" from the Association, authorizing them to solemnize marriage according to the laws of the State, are Mrs. M. Fuller, Mrs. H. H. Fuller, Mrs. Wm. Wakefield, H. H. Smith, Isaac Pope, and Harriet E. Pope, while there are a number of others, who lecture in the State, and are doing a good work.

Our cause is prospering; many are anxiously inquiring of our philosophy, and there seems to be a deep-seated earnestness in the whole people. Societies are forming, and meeting return tickets free to so many of the delegates.

Our Semi-Annual Convention is to be held in Minneapolis, June 21, 22d and 23d, 1872.

A music dealer in town generously loaned an organ for the use of the Association, for which he has the thanks of every music-loving soul.

The seven fires in the Northwest of Minnesota, and the scanty crops throughout the State, have, in a measure, crippled our resources, but Spiritualists are hopeful, and we are determined in Minnesota, to stand by the banner of Equal Rights and Progression. Dr. Bailey and others plead earnestly for our spiritual papers, urging all to subscribe who did not take them, and especially the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL and Lyceum Banner. The sufferers by the late fires have also enlisted the sympathies of every one, and especially every Spiritualist; and we hope materials aid will be given them, as we are home sick to once more greet the friends and JOURNAL.

Iowa.

The town of Iowa Falls is situated on the bank of Iowa River, about one hundred and fifty miles west of Dubuque, on the Northwestern extension of the Illinois Central R.R. It is very pleasantly situated, has beautiful gardens and orchards, interspersed with fine groves and pleasant streets, and contains about two thousand inhabitants. At this point the State Convention of Spiritualists for 1871 was held. A large and commodious hall was provided for the occasion, and many warm friends greeted us. Among the number we hold in grateful remembrance are Mr. and Mrs. Stevens, of the Union Hotel. Their doors were thrown open to us, and Mr. and Mrs. Higgins extended their kind hospitality to twenty or thirty of the friends. Mr. and Mrs. Bump rented a house in town, that they might all be boarding friends. The convention was well represented from all parts of the State, and speakers and people seemed determined to have a good time. Dr. Bailey, of Indiana, Mrs. Allen Pratt, held the audience spell-bound with his inspired eloquence. P. P. Good, with his stirring, energetic, matter-of-fact arguments. Mrs. Bailey, with her silvery tones enlisted the truth, made it the most interesting time ever held in the State.

Spiritualists seeking a home in the West will do well to settle at Iowa Falls. EDWIN CATE, Sec.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Eclectic Magazine. E. R. Pelton, Publisher, 108 Fulton St., New York. Terms, $4.00 per year; two copies, $8.00; single copies, 45 cents.

Those who think that investigations into the life of Shakspeare, and criticism upon his plays, are overworked and barren themes, would do well to read "Shakspeare and his Times," which forms the leading article in the Eclectic Magazine for November. Among others we particularly noticed such admirable articles as "Modern Geology and the Mosaic Account of Creation"; "Cathay, with Notices of Travelers to that Country," an admirable and appreciative review of William Wordsworth, and another on the "Character of Cleopatra." The number is embellished with a fine portrait of Beethoven.

The American Odd Fellow, for November. Published by the A.O.F. Association, No. 96 Nassau St., N. Y. $2.50 a year.

The last issue of this popular magazine is most attractive and valuable. In its varied contents we notice several good stories and sketches; illustrated articles, on "The Great Horse of North America and Newport"; "Letters from under a Lamp-post"; "An Odd Fellow Abroad"; "Leaves from a Rover's Life-log"; "Scientific and curious Facts"; "Humors of the Day"; "Ladies' Olio"; "Interesting Miscellany"; Correspondence from all quarters, &c., &c.

Looking Beyond. A souvenir of love to the bereft of every home. By J. O. Barrett. Wm. White & Co., Boston, Publishers.

This Book is the production of one of our most gifted minds, and will be read with unusual interest. The reader will find its pages glistening with a "sunny philosophy,"—"a balm for every wounded heart." He relates some startling incidents in connection with Spiritualism that cannot fail to be of intense interest.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy. Published quarterly by S. H. Jones, Mo.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of speculative philosophy in all its departments. Advanced minds should subscribe for it. All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor, Wm. T. Harris, box 3298, St. Louis, Mo.

Is Spiritualism True? is another spicy pamphlet. By Prof. Denton. Issued by the Banner of Light office.

It contains a few closely printed pages, and answers the question proposed in a manner satisfactory to every reflective mind.

The Herald of Health, for November, contains a very valuable letter from P. T. Barnum to the Editor, on his health, habits, and the relation of amusements to health, which it will well repay every thoughtful person, whether sick or well, to read. This number also has a splendid article on the management of children, by Mr. Abbott, which every parent should peruse. The publishers offer each subscriber a premium of a book entitled "Physical Perfection," with three hundred pages and one hundred engravings, or Webster's Pocket Dictionary, with eighteen thousand words, etc., etc., providing they send 15 cents extra for postage; also, October, November, and December numbers of this year free. Try it a year. Price, $2.00,—20 cents a number.

The Phrenological Journal, one of the few magazines which are published at the present day for the radical benefit of radical readers, is represented on our table by its November number. The contents should interest every live member of our community. The following are particularly interesting: "James McCosh, President of Princeton College"; "A Man among Men"; "Spiritual Presence"; "The Educated Man in American Society"; "Alice; or, Blighters"; "Thoughts on Physiology"; "The Tagals and Visayans," etc., etc. The publisher offers the last three numbers of 1871, free, as a premium to subscribers for 1872. Terms, $3.00 a year. S. R. Wells, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

The Overland Monthly, for November, contains an article from the pen of Capt. C. M. Seammon, on the "Pacific Sea Coast View," which is replete with interest. Other articles: "Above all Price"; "The Lost Treasure of Montezuma"; "The Oregon Indians"; "Maximillian and the American Legion." These all abound with matter of interest to every one.

The Radical, for November, comes freighted with interest to every liberal thinker.

CHRISTIANITY,

Its Origin, Nature, and Tendency,

Considered in the Light of ASTRO-THEOLOGY.

BY D. W. HULL.

This book is, as far as it goes, a thorough review of the origin of the Christian system, showing it all to be plagiarized from ancient heathens. Being unlike almost any other work ever written on the subject, it cannot but be deeply interesting to all. Its explanations of Scripture are lucid, and so self-evidently correct that no one can gainsay them.

Price, 35 cents; postage 2 cents.

SPIRITS OR IMPOSTORS?

The Wonderful Performances at Moravia, New York.

(CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.)

When the preparation of this room had been completed; about two years ago, according to all the minute directions of the aboriginal ghost, a sitting was ordered there by the same authority. Precisely who were present at that sitting our reporter could not ascertain; but both Mr. and Mrs. Keeler were present, and also Mary Andrews, the medium. Mr. Keeler and his wife, and whoever else might have been with them, took seats, arranged in semi-circular positions before the strange enclosure, while the medium sat herself down in front of and facing them, which placed her close to the board partition, and nearly under the aperture in that structure. When all was arranged the lights were extinguished, as at former sittings, and for a little while silence and darkness reigned. Presently the strange lights appeared as of old, and all the other unaccountable mysteries, when out of the darkness came the voice of the savage ghost, directing that a lamp be produced and the medium be shut into the dark cabinet. These directions were obeyed, when silence again reigned for a time. Suddenly the black curtain over the aperture in the partition was observed to move, as if an effort was being made to raise it, and Mary Andrews cried out from within the cabinet, as

IF IN GREAT TERROR:

"There's a man in here! Let me out! Let me out quick!"

Mr. Keeler, however, calmed her fears by assuring her that there could possibly be no man there, but that what she saw must be a spirit; and urged her to remain quiet and see what wonders would be performed.

After the interruption another period of silence ensued, when the agitation of the curtain was renewed, lasting for a moment or two, when a voice came from the opening, uttering these words:

"Too much light! Spirits can't stand the pressure."

Accepting the intimation conveyed by the words, Mr. Keeler lowered the blaze of the lamp until it shed but a glimmer of light in the gloomy apartment. Then followed another period of patient waiting and watching, when suddenly a copper-colored hand was thrust out from beneath the curtain, with the index finger extended, pointed first at Mr. Keeler, then at the lamp, and then at the end of the piano nearest the partition. This pantomime was easily translated, and Mr. Keeler proceeded to remove the lamp from its position in front of the aperture to the place indicated on the piano; the effect of which was to cause the light to shine obliquely across the opening without penetrating it. This arrangement seemed to be satisfactory to the spirits, who indicated their pleasure by sundry warwhoops and grunting "ughs," after the traditional savage fashion. Pretty soon completely from the aperture, and a face presented itself at the opening. It was an unmistakeable Indian face, with high cheekbones, dusky hue, and all the usual characteristics. When the astonishment that the apparition produced had subsided into an eager waiting for what was to follow, the lips of the apparition moved, and a voice proceeding from them pronounced these profound words:

THE BLACK CURTAIN ROSE

"Me big spirit! me boss here! Plenty pale faces come see big spirit! Big spirit make everybody believe! Ugh!"

And the big spirit disappeared again into the darkness, and the curtain fell. Then there was stillness again for a brief period, interrupted only at last by a terrific shriek from the inprisoned medium, followed by a crash as she dashed the rude door away and came tumbling out into the room more dead than alive with fright. On being questioned regarding the cause of her alarm, she replied that a cold, clammy hand was placed on her face, and she wouldn't stand that from the spirits or from anybody else. Of course this little episode terminated that particular seance, and the company broke up, wondering greatly at the things they had seen and heard.

SPEECH FROM AN INDIAN SPIRIT.

On the following day Mary was induced to sit again, though with the distinct understanding that she would not go into the box or cabinet if the spirits were going to put their hands onto her; and if they did play any tricks with her, or trouble her in any way, she would not again sit. With this understanding the seance was commenced with pretty much the same preliminaries in the darkened room as on the first day. When the light was called for, it was arranged understandingly to suit the notions of the ghostly visitors. At this sitting several different faces appeared, some white and others swarthy, some male and others female. All did not talk, the majority confining themselves to pantomimic displays. Finally the big Indian spirit appeared, as if to close the performance in due form, and spoke apiece as follows:

"Me big spirit! me boss here! Spirits make everybody believe. Heaps of folks come here now. Folks must pay to see spirits. Mary Andrews get two dollars every time. She no sit for less. Spirits no come. Ugh."

And so it happened that thereafter the happy medium of communication between mortals and the spirits of the departed exacted a fee of $2 for every sitting, whether the number of spirit seekers were many or few. And as the rush is now very great, her income is by no means inconsiderable. Frequently she is required to sit as many as six times a day, and scarcely ever less than four times; so that her earning are from $8 to $12 every day. This income she religiously pockets herself, and appropriates wholly to her own use, greatly to the indignation and wrath of the Keelers, who make no secret of their displeasure with her for not dividing. They say that she earns all the money, while they are compelled to undergo all the trouble and expense; and all they make is the profits that accrue from the board of human visitors and the keeping of horses. However, they can't very well afford to kill the goose that lay and as the spirits won't come unless Mary Andrews is present, they are forced to submit and allow her to pocket her fees. But Mr. Keeler says that he is going to talk with the spirits about it. He thinks that he ought to be paid something for his own time in superintending the operations; though visitor generally had quite as lief he would not be present, notwithstanding he persists in joining every circle that is formed when he is about. But his presence is not absolutely necessary, as it has been discovered that the show goes on quite as well without him as when he is there.

With this minute and extended account of the origin and rise of these strange developments; which has been obtained from the parties themselves and from the neighbors, and may therefore be considered in a measure apocryphal, we will slip over the two years during which the manifestations have been getting into good running order, and obtaining currency among Spiritualists generally, and come down to the present time and the observations and investigations of the Sun reporter, who has just returned from a protracted visit to the locality and a patient study of the phenomenon.

SEEKING THE SPIRITS.

The reporter arrived in Moravia, a stranger in the place, without announcement or letters of introduction, about five o'clock, in the afternoon. He found his way to the Moravia House, the most considerable and respectable tavern in the place, and withal an excellent country hotel, where he secured a room and then proceeded in search of the renowned medium. The hotel proprietor directed him to her residence, but on arriving there the reporter was told that she was not at home; she was up at Mr. Keeler's on the hill. This house, about half a mile distant, was pointed out, and the reporter started in that direction. About half way up the hill, he met a woman coming down, but thought nothing more of it. He found the Keeler family at supper, the company consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Keeler, the little girl that has been spoken of, two hired men, and two ladies and a gentleman, who he afterwards learned were temporary boarders visiting the spirits. The ladies were from Herkimer county, and the gentleman from some place that he was careful not to divulge. The reporter was received without the slightest indication of surprise, it being supposed of course that he was only another guest attracted by the usual magnet. Nobody rose from the table to greet him; nobody asked any questions. He stood in the doorway and asked if Mr. Keeler was at home. Mr. Keeler looked up from his plate and replied, asking the reporter if he had been to supper. The reporter prevaricated, and said that as he wished to see Mr. Keeler alone, and was not in a hurry, he would wait outside until the meal was over. In due time Mr. Keeler came out. The reporter drew him aside mysteriously and said he had heard of Mrs. Andrew's strange gifts, and had come to observe them.

"Certainly," said Mr. Keeler—and we will put his language into English, lest his utter disregard of all grammatical rules would render him unintelligible to the general reader—"Certainly, that's what people generally come here for. I knew what you wanted when I first saw you. But

YOU CAN'T SEE SPIRITS TO-NIGHT."

Reporter—Why not?

Keeler—Because the medium has gone home?

Reporter—Don't she stay here with you?

Keeler—No, she lives down in the village. You must have met her going down; she just left before you come in.

Reporter—I did meet a lady half way down the hill. But can't you get her back here?

Keeler—It's no use of trying; she won't come. And perhaps if you should get her the spirits wouldn't come. They act very strangely. Sometimes they won't come at all.

Reporter—Has n't this been a good day for them?

Keeler—Yes, this has been a good day. We have had some wonderful manifestations; and the medium is tired out now and she won't come back.

Reporter—But I want to go away in the morning, and I am very anxious to see the spirits while I am here.

Keeler—There's no use of trying to urge this thing. The spirits take their own time. If you want to see something you may as well make up your mind to stay awhile. You can stay here at our house, if you want to; there's plenty of room; but if you are in a hurry you had better go along and give it up.

Reporter—But I am willing to pay the medium liberally for her trouble if she will give me a sitting to-night.

Keeler—Well; you can go and see her; if she's willing to set she can; but I do n't believe you'll get her. You had better save your money, for if you force the thing like as not you won't see anything. The spirits are very curious, and you can't tell nothing about them, what they will do.

Mr. Keeler here intimated that he was going down town, and he and the reporter walked along together, continuing the conversation.

Keeler—These are wonderful manifestations, but they ain't nothing to what we will have pretty soon. The time is coming very soon now when there won't be no skepics. The spirits tell me so. They tell me that they will soon be able to show themselves to anybody everywhere, but the time ain't come yet. They know their own business, and we can't tell nothing about them. All we can do is to wait and see.

AFTER THE MEDIUM.

When the two had reached the foot of the hill, Mr. Keeler pointed to Mrs. Andrew's house, bidding the reporter to get her if he could, and himself turned into the main street and went about his business. Mrs. Andrews was found without difficulty, and promptly to the call of the reporter. She is a good-looking young woman, apparently about thirty years of age, of medium height and rather stoutly built, plainly but neatly dressed, has just a suspicion of her Irish parentage in her face, but more of the Yankee twang in her speech. There is a little touch of sadness in the fine expression of her face, but the countenance lights up with a pleasant smile on entering into conversation. Though clearly not an educated person, she has more natural intelligence than the Keelers, and appears to be far better informed on general subjects than they. She received the call of the reporter quite as unconcernedly as did the Keelers. The interview was quite short, however.

Reporter.—Mrs. Andrews, I have called to try and induce you to give me a sitting this evening.

Mrs. Andrews.—I never sit in the evening. I have enough to do in the day time without that. Besides, I have sat four times to-day, and I'm tired.

Reporter.—But I will pay you liberally if you will accommodate me. What is your usual fee?

Mrs. Andrews.—Two dollars.

Reporter.—Well, I will give you five for a sitting to-night.

Mrs. Andrews.—Maybe you wouldn't get anything, and then you would be throwing your money away.

Reporter.—Don't the spirits always come at your bidding?

Mrs. Andrews.—O no; they only come when they have a mind to. Sometimes they don't come at all. As I have been sitting all day to-day, it is more than likely I could not get anything to-night.

Reporter.—But I have stopped here expressly to see these manifestations, and I want to go off on the train in the morning.

Mrs. Andrews.—Very well; I will sit for you in the morning before the train goes, and then it won't cost you anything extra. I will be up to the house at six o'clock; then I'll be fresh, and perhaps we can get a good manifestation. I had rather not try it to-night.

IN THE SPIRITUAL HOUSE.

As this was the best arrangement that could be made, it had to be submitted to, and the reporter returned to his hotel. Promptly at the appointed time in the morning he presented himself at the Keeler house. Mrs. Keeler was busy preparing breakfast, the hired men were just bringing in the milk of half-a-dozen cows, the rest of the household had not yet risen, and the medium had not arrived. The reporter waited until 7 o'clock, when breakfast was announced. The family dropped into the kitchen, one at a time, for their morning meal, and the reporter accepted an invitation to break his fast with them, for which his fifty cents was subsequently paid.

After breakfast, at which nothing was said of Spiritualism, only the appointment with the medium and her delay was mentioned, the Herkimer County ladies suggesting that, while waiting for Mrs. Andrews, the reporter go up stairs and examine the room and cabinet.

A LOOK AT THE SPIRITS' NEST.

Mr. Keeler assented to this, with a protest against the suspicion that should make such an examination necessary. These suggestions, it must be understood, were made without any knowledge of the reporter's official character, or that he was anything different from an ordinary visitor. The suggestion, moreover, came from the ladies, who were utter strangers to him, and without the slightest intimation on his part that he desired to make such an examination. However, he was duly thankful for the opportunity presented, and availed himself of it without hesitation. He was furnished with a light, and guided by Mr. Keeler and the two ladies, who were even more curious than he, and perhaps equally suspicious, he entered the main room, and through it the cabinet, which he cursorily examined in all its parts, though, as he had never witnessed the ghostly parade there, he was not so particular as he might otherwise have been. But on general principles he satisfied himself that the cabinet was a close apartment, devoid of machinery or furniture, and with no opening but the curtained spirit window and the door through which the medium enters.

While making these observations the medium arrived, attended by a young woman in black who was not introduced, but who was understood to be Mrs. Andrews' personal friend. The reporter withdrew from the cabinet into the main room, and a circle was at once formed, Mr. Keeler sitting on the left, then the young woman in black, the reporter in the center, with the Herkimer County ladies on the right, and the medium in front. When all was ready the door of the room was closed, and the light extinguished. The darkness that then filled the room was painful. Conversation was carried on as usual. Presently Mr. Keeler proposed that of the music was immaterial, the only object being to bring the company into more perfect harmony, without which the spirits couldn't operate. Finally, to remove any pretended obstacle, the reporter lent his somewhat remarkable vocal powers to the good of the cause. As he esteemed it a solemn occasion he struck up a solemn tune, selecting the words,

"Hark! from the tombs a doleful sound,
Mine ears attend the cry."

But the spirits didn't seem to fancy such doleful notes, and Mr. Keeler suggested something a little more lively, whereupon the tune was changed, and the company sang the very appropriate words,

"Mary to the Saviour's tomb Hastened at the early dawn."

The company all joined in these words with much zest, and flattered themselves that they made very good music. Still the spirits held aloof. Mr. Keeler then suggested that the music was not sufficiently lively; that something more stirring must be sung. The limited nature of the reporter's repertoire did not furnish a great variety of tunes of the nature indicated however; he happened to think of an old-fashioned Methodist revival tune, fitting the words,

"Here I raise my Ebenezer, Hither by thy help I'm come," and with perfect recklessness he raised the tune at a 2.40 rate, the whole company falling in with great gusto, though, owing to the reporter's stirring and lively style, straggling from one to six notes behind him. But the tune was rendered with power enough to startle

THE SLEEPERS OF THE OTHER WORLD,

even if the shocking discord did not bring them in vengeance about the ears of the thoughtless mortals. But they came not, and when the words were exhausted, stillness and darkness reigned again. As a final effort, the reporter, in utter desperation, struck up,

"John Brown's body lies mouldering in the ground."

He sang the first verse alone, but the company came in nobly on the "Glory, Hallelujah" chorus, and on repeating it, were rewarded with help from the coy spirits of darkness. Seemingly out from the dark and empty cabinet came three voices, two male and a female, singing soprano, tenor, and alto respectively. They joined only in the chorus, but sang then clearly and with a degree of ability that put the mortal choir to the blush. Here, then, was mystery number one. Mr. Keeler and the reporter were the only males in the room when the door was shut, and it had not since opened. Keeler's position was clearly manifested, even in the darkness, by his constant asthmatic wheeze and disagreeable coughing. The reporter, of course, could distinguish his own voice among the mortals. Whence, then, came these two additional male voices, even supposing that Mary Andrews turnished the female voice?

INTERVIEWING THE SPIRITS.

When the singing ceased, the reporter essayed a little conversation with the spirits:

"Reporter—The spirits seem to live a full chorus of his own; will they not favor us with a song by themselves?

Silence alone answered the request. After waiting a moment the question was slightly varied and a "please" added. Then out from the darkness came a hollow voice, saying:

"The burden is greater than we can bear."

If the burden of that music was too great for the spirits, the reporter concluded it was too great for him, so he too refused to sing any more. Then silence prevailed for a while. Presently, directly in front, two exceedingly bright lights appeared, apparently not larger than a pea, shining but for a moment and then disappearing. These were succeeded by others of like character, some appearing directly over the heads of the sitters, other behind them, or wherever a presumable chance might put them. With these appearances one of the Herkimer county ladies described a beautiful, golden-haired child which she professed to see, though nobody else could see anything but the specks of light and the impenetrable darkness. Then the room seemed to be filled with shapeless and undefined moving about in all directions, which Mr. Keeler said were spirits. While these displays were being made the same hollowed-toned voice came again from the darkness, with the profound utterance,

CLOUDS OF RARE FLEECINESS,

"My friends, this is a beautiful reality."

The reporter thought so too, but he didn't say it. Just then there came a gentle hand, softly but unmistakably patting him on his knee. He clutched at the unseen manual, supposing, of course, that the spirit wanted to shake hands, but he grasped only a dark nothing—the ghost had vanished.

Finally, after a protracted performance of this character, a gentle tapping was heard on the wall. Keeler, who was evidently up to the business, at once asked:

"Do you want a light?"

Two taps were translated as an affirmative reply, and a match was promptly struck and the lamp re-lit. On recovering the sense of sight, everybody looked around and discovered everybody else sitting just as when the lamp was fast burning, and no apparent change in the room. The medium then took her chair and retired within the cabinet, seating herself at the extreme north end, and just within the door. Mr. Keeler then put up and fastened the door, placed the light on the plane in the position heretofore described, set a rough paper screen in such a position as to shape the lamp done, when the curtain covering the aperture was seen to move. All eyes were riveted upon it. Then it fell back and remained at rest. Again it moved as if an effort was being made to raise it. Slowly the lower right-hand corner was rolled back until the opening was about half uncovered. Then a figure presented itself in the opening and quickly withdrew, letting the curtain fall again. No one had seen the figure distinctly, nor could anybody tell what it was, though all asked. Presently the curtain was raised again as before, and presenting itself a little more into the light, but only far enough to be recognized as the face of a man. As it again withdrew, the whole company united in a request that the spirit show himself more plainly. The obliging old fellow made the effort. Drawing the curtain aside, he thrust his face quite through the opening until the light of the lamp fell upon its side. It was a venerable-looking face, not at all ghost-like or repulsive. It looked something like William Cullen Bryant. The head was covered with snowy white hair, quite thick and long. It had full whiskers of equal whiteness, and a heavy moustache that curled under like a heavy roll of hair. It was the face of a voiceless spirit, and withdrew itself as quick as seen.

While the company was urging the venerable spirit to give his name the curtain again rose, this time from the left-hand corner, and an entirely different face appeared. This was the face of a man certainly fifty years of age, with iron-gray hair and whiskers, but no moustache. He wore gold spectacles. He was a very familiar spirit, showing himself with great freedom, but he refused to talk, contenting himself with playing bopeep with the audience for about five minutes and then withdrawing absolutely. While the company sat waiting for his reappearance, or for some other development a hand came out of the aperture, and, pointing first at Keeler and then at the cabinet door, quickly withdrew. This pantomime was readily translated by Keeler as the end of the performance. It meant that he was to open the door and let the medium out, which he did, and the company broke up. As soon as the medium came out, the reporter again entered the cabinet and examined it more closely than before, but failed to discover any traps or machinery, or any means of ingress save through the door or by the windows.

ARRIVAL OF DR. NORTH.

On going down stairs, it was found that the morning train had passed, so that the reporter could not get away until evening. The train had brought some recruits to the company of spirit-seekers, chiefly Dr. North, a known Spiritualist from New York, and two very genteel appearing ladies from the same city. Dr. North was very anxious for an immediate interview with the supernatural apparitions, and desired that nobody but the medium and Mr. Keeler should be present. So the reporter left them to consult the oracle alone and went down to the village. After a midday dinner he returned to the house, hoping to join the company in an immediate sitting. Mrs. Keeler was in the kitchen attending to her domestic duties, and the child-grandchild was playing about the door and yard. Nobody else was to be seen. Mrs. Keeler informed the reporter that the "folks" had just gone up stairs, and intimated that, as they were probably not yet to work, if the reporter would go up he would doubtless be admitted. The reporter went up and tapped at the door, but the company seemed indisposed to admit him. So he returned below and improved the opportunity to reconnoitre outside. First satisfying himself that Mrs. Keeler and the child were still employed in the back part of the house and yard, he walked around in front to watch the windows in the tower opening into the mysterious cabinet. While watching these, he could distinctly hear the voices of the people in the upper room conversing and singing. He also opened the slats of the parlor windows under the ghosts' operating room, and kept the ceiling of that apartment in view. And while keeping an eye generally about the tower, he discovered a ventilator window in the foundation wall opening into the cellar portion of the tower. This he had the entire external portion of the tower in view, as well as its interior below the cabinet; and he testifies most positively, and of his own knowledge, that during this particular seance no person approached the apartment from these directions. The formation of the cabinet precludes the possibility of any access to it from above, unless while the room is darkened, and then escape by that direction after the manifestations, if it were otherwise possible, would be attended with danger of discovery, as after the light is once lit it is not again extinguished, and the space above the cabinet is open to the view of the sitters.

THE SPIRITS KNOW THEIR BUSINESS.

While the reporter was thus standing guard on the outside the seance terminated. Then he was immediately called for. The manifestations had been unsatisfactory, which was attributed to the ghostly displeasure that a visitor had been excluded, and the whole company united in a desire that the reporter should join them in another sitting. This he was ready to do, and the circle was soon formed. It consisted of the two New York ladies on the extreme right, then Dr. North, one of the Herkimer county ladies, the strange gentleman above mentioned who had not given his name or residence, the other Herkimer lady, the Sun reporter, the young lady in black, and Mr. Keeler on the extreme left. PROGRESSION.

By Wm. C. W.

It is claimed by those living in the body and out of the body, that it is prescribed in the book of Providence, that humanity, collectively and individually, shall come slowly towards perfection, and yet, through all the devious changing, checkered way, we are ever approaching something better.

If there is truth in such a sentiment, its chief beauty and value may be found in the fact that it crushes hope out of no human soul. The poor man living in his lowly cot, walking in the most humble vales of life, laboring daily to procure bread for his dear wife and children, may hopefully look forward to a better time coming, even though that time be deferred past the boundary line of the present world.

The poor criminal captive in his lonely prison cell, in tears and bitter anguish of soul may exclaim, "Oh! this lonely solitude, it is dreadful to bear, to be shut away from social life and the bright sunshine." Yet, over and above, out beyond the bitter consequences of his sins, he may say there is a better time coming.

We all can bear the sorrows of this life, and some of us, perhaps, even grow stronger in bearing our afflictions, if we can only feel assured that the bright millennium morning will come. Let the sun of hope, immortal life, and unending joys beyond the tomb, throw their mellow beams on the hill tops and we will work right on, hoping, trusting, that through all the dust, darkness and trouble, we shall triumph at last. We may pine and sigh, faint and fall; but we will get up again and go on our journey, feeling that through all this, our Father calls us to come to Him.

There are doubless great crosses for us to bear in this world, but it can hardly be said they come of leading a religious life, for that is to be, to act in accord with divine laws, to be reverent towards the author of our being, to be kind and lenient towards humanity, to be just and noble in our lives, and certainly, no cross can come of that.

Yet along the dusty highways of life, we meet men, and when we look into their faces, we see that they are bearing a heavy cross on toward their calvary and their crucifixion. Not by the power of the Jews, but rather by the power of their own bitter prejudices, appetites and passions—these as, arrows, thrust them through and through,—these may wrap a winding sheet about them, and lay them down in their graves, and what will become of their poor souls then?

An objecter might say we should stop at that point, for it is just there that nature takes a sudden turn off in to the dark. Are we not oftimes assured by those who claim to know, that from out the shadowy folds of death, no loving father sends word back to his wife and children, no tender-hearted mother calls to her darling child, the dearest friend sends no whispering from out the invisible air; and the skeptic tells us that the silence which settles down upon the grave, may, or may never be broken on some distant shore, that immortality may be only a dream of the imagination, a mirage of the mind, soon to fade forever away.

Still we have an inner consciousness, an unyielding faith that all these departed souls are held within the all-permeating grasp of the Infinite Father—that the attributes of his mind are justice, love, mercy, wisdom and a reasonable judgment, and that all these human souls, regenerate and unregenerate in their future states, must be conditioned in keeping with the demands of these essential attributes of the omnipotent mind.

Then, are we not told in the Scriptures, that Jesus "being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit: By which also he went, and preached unto the spirits in prison, which sometimes were disobedient, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah." (I Peter 3: 18—20). Was not that just what might have been expected of that sweet souled Nazarene, that large souled philanthropist and lover of humanity? Having laid off the outer form, he first gives his attention to the work of preaching in a future life, the same class of erring and belated, for whom he had been laboring in this world.

Are we to suppose that such persons as Fox, Wilberforce, Hopper, Lucretia Mott, Smith, Garrison, or Phillips, in simply laying off the outer garment of the soul,—will they ask for reserved seats away among the Father's higher mansions? Will their hearts grow cold and indifferent towards poor, erring, suffering humanity, either in the body, or out of the body? Will they be any less philanthropists in that bright world, than in this? I speak of them only as representatives of a certain class of minds; but would it not be rational to suppose that all kind souled up-lifters of humanity, should follow the example of the gentle Nazarene? When upon the future shores, they have passed kindly greetings with old friends, received the warm congratulations and thanks of those for whom they have nobly labored in this world,—would they not be likely then to say to their friends, you know that our soul faculties are all cultured, trained and set to work for the lowly, the belated and misguided, and surely there must be vast millions of these ever rising from material worlds into the realm of spirit life. Then show us the way, we will go right to work, we will follow in the footsteps of Jesus! Our hearts are all aglow, burning with love for the labor!

Do not these faithful souls, these workers for humanity know that the sweetest melody in the Universe, is the still, quiet refrain of the loving heart that runs to assist the needy? Do they not know, that the most eloquent prayers that reverberate, echo and re-echo along the far off aisles of immensity, are the works of the busy souls that lift up the weak, the fallen, the lowly and belated, and send them on their way rejoicing through the Father's kingdom?

MEDIUMSHIP, DISEASE, ETC.

By H. S. Johnson.

What is it that brings a medium in rapport with a diseased person? For instance, a person residing in Québec, Canada, may write to a person living in New Orleans, and that person on taking the letter in his or her hand, may feel the condition of the person in Quebec, mentally and physically. The medium may hold the writing, or a lock of hair in his or her hand, and feel the individual's exact condition. If he has lofty aspirations and inspirations, it will be felt by the medium. Or on being introduced to a stranger, and taking his hand, one may feel a thrill of pleasure or a thrill of horror. Now, what is the power that brings the medium in rapport with these conditions? It is a question of great import to the people of the present age, for mediums can testify to these things as facts, not in isolated cases, but by thousands! I will cite a few instances. A person came to me for treatment, who had fits. I had the same spasmodic action of the nerves and muscles that he had. Another case of a young man who had rheumetism in all of his joints, so that he could not raise himself from his seat. I was stiffened exactly like him, and used his expressions. I had never seen or heard of him before. I might enumerate many other cases, such as delirium tremens, nervous headache, and disease in every part,—always locating the disease properly.

Now, if there is no magnetism, and if it is by the will-power of the individual, treated that a cure is effected, why was it that in the case of a little child I was called to see, whom the parents supposed was dying, for she had not recognized or spoken to any one for four days, why was it that this child, in fifteen minutes after a magnetic treatment, became conscious of the persons in the room, looked around, and from that moment was made better,—well as it were, and has not been sick since, but has had better health than ever before? Again, a little girl, three years old, was brought to me who had fits every night. I gave her a magnetic treatment and some medicine. She has not had fits since. In these cases, I have cited, I see no evidence of will-power on the part of the patient, but I have great reason to believe in the existence of magnetism.

A person dwelling in Chicago, may be affected by the thought of one who is in St. Petersburg, for with the magnetic power space is annihilated as it were. Our atmosphere is a network of thought conveyed upon the wires of magnetism from one brain to another, or we might call it from one battery to another. Sometimes thoughts are emitted, and sent out at random, as it were, and they find lodgment in some receptive brain. For instance, here is a farmer with large thinking capacity, but no education, no talent for speaking. He seats himself in a corner alone, and thinks thoughts that are grand and expansive, but he has no means of conveying those thoughts to the people. Let us follow these thoughts. They have gone forth from his brain and in the business of the day he has forgotten them. We see them gliding along on one of these magnetic wires. We follow them until we come to a man who is preparing a speech, or lecture. These thoughts enter his brain, and he supposes them to be original with himself, yet we see that they originated with a hard working, ignorant farmer. This lecturer's brain was a receptive brain, and was educated according to the age in which he lived. In neither of these men do we see that the will produced these effects. We do not wish to deny that the will can assist in the cure of disease, or that it can produce disease, for these things are facts, but we wish to say, that there is something more than the will. There is an unseen influence, underlying and permeating all the actions of man, and to understand man in all his varied relations, and understand how to educate the will, and how to govern the magnetic power, we must follow him back to his ante-natal conditions, then examine his surroundings from his infancy up. We must weigh him in the balances of circumstances. We must measure him in the hydrometer. We must examine him by the thermometer, and try him by the barometer, to know why certain diseases are produced, what relation the will bears to the body, what moral conception he has, what his religion is,—then see what the class of spirits are that surround him, and then we have not one-half the hidden forces of nature that are brought to bear upon a human being.

SATURDAY NIGHT.

By Sada Bailey.

Another week is ended; weary from its toils, but with a peaceful conscience, and calm enjoyment of duties cheerfully performed, I sit down to pen thoughts as they come.

Methinks the influence of my musings is somewhat akin to the spirit which inspires Brick Pomeroy's "Saturday Night;" but even were I gifted with his genius, time at present forbids my indulging in the sentimental spirituality which characterizes the angel-wrought productions of this diversified writer's lighter and holier moods.

This evening, Brick, as well as myself, has a new theme for "Our Saturday Night." Oh! what wonderful changes may be wrought between two of those Saturday nights. One week ago one of the mighty wonders of the world, the great commercial city of Chicago, proudly stood where now are sleeping naught but smouldering ashes and ruins.

"All comes for the best." Ah! now I am thankfully gazing upon my precious little ones, who in safety are sweetly sleeping, after their refreshing bath of Saturday night. The question comes, If their dear lives had been a sacrifice to the fire fiend, could their mother, with heroism of martyrdom, have won within the sentence she has just penned, the faith-giving sentiment of our philosophy, "All comes for the best?" Be that as it may, it is my honest opinion that through all this untold suffering, this raging fire has done its work of purification as well as destruction.

The dross of selfishness has been melted from millions of human hearts, and the pure gold of benevolence shines in radiant luster. The magnetic chain of sympathy has been welded; which unites all humanity's children into one common brotherhood; and millions of souls throughout many nations of the earth realize that to-day we are living an event of history, which will bequeath to future generations a record of kindly deeds unequaled in the records of the past.

How many happy Saturday nights I have spent alone, but not lonely, in looking over the spiritualistic periodicals, all kindly sent me by the editors and editresses, who know me to be their true friend and earnest co-laborer. On my stand is a place for the Banner of Light, the American Spiritualist, the Crucible, Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly, and last, but not least, the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL; but a tear of sorrow falls, because this Saturday night thy place, dear JOURNAL, is vacant. Then to-morrow, though it be the Sabbath day, I will work; give my little mite to re-instate in Chicago the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL—this excellent paper, this noble exponent of our philosophy, trusting that my spiritual friends may think with myself and Jesus, that "It is lawful to work on the Sabbath day.

Voices from the People.

OSAKIS, MINN.—E. Tannehill writes.—I received No. 5 of the JOURNAL to-day, and do truly sympathize with the unfortunate by the fire in Chicago, and especially with the proprietor of the JOURNAL. It would be too long for me to tell how I came to lose the weekly visits of the paper. Please find inclosed three dollars.

CHARDON, OHIO.—H. Chamberlain writes.—I have responded to your call for aid in a simple form. Would that I could do more, for I have only succeeded in getting a renewal of subscription, when I was in hopes to have been able to send you several new subscribers. Inclosed find post office order for eight dollars. Credit as directed.

BYRON, N. Y.—J. W. Seaver writes.—Inclosed find three dollars. Yourself and all other sufferers by the great fire, have the warm sympathy of the people in all parts of the country. I trust you have not met with any heavy pecuniary loss, and that you may soon, as heretofore, be doing battle nobly for the cause of truth.

LA FAYETTE, IND.—S. Thayer writes.—Your circular was duly received a few days since, and I hasten to comply and also order to preserve dollars, the amount due you for the JOURNAL to May next. It should have been sent before. When I heard of the fire raging in Chicago, my first thought was, "I wonder how it fares with Brother Jones," hoping his office would be spared, for I hardly know how I could get along without the JOURNAL. I think Brother Francis has found a solid platform to rest upon in his "Search after God," when we contemplate the terrible suffering of human beings resulting from the fate of the city.

RUSHFORD, MINN.—E. G. Chase writes.—You no doubt are anxious to hear from the entire list of your subscribers who are in arrears for your paper. Having been burned out a year ago last August, involving a loss of $7,500, without a dollar insurance, I feel that I know how to sympathize with you and all your fellow citizens. I have been struggling to build up my business ever since fire, and find to-day that the struggle is only just begun. Incessant toil and untiring energy, in a way that will overcome such disasters, and my best wishes shall be with you for your future prosperity. Inclosed find three dollars for a year's subscription to the JOURNAL, and only wish I were able to furnish you all you need.

BAKER CITY, OREGON.—Wm. F. McCrary writes.—We have this day received your extra informing us of your condition since the great fire. I hasten to send you what I could get on the spur of the moment, and send by this mail.

WATERLOO, WIS.—J. O. Barrett writes.—Inclosed find post office order for ten dollars, which credit as directed. Glad to learn that so many friends respond to your needs in this hour of your misfortune respecting the JOURNAL.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA.—H. G. Griffin writes. Brother, I shall do the best I can to aid you. You have done me a kindness I never can forget. You will find inclosed four dollars, to credit on my subscription.

DUNDEE, MICH.—E. S. Sorter writes.—Your appeal for help reached me at a late hour, but better late than never. I am glad to learn that the JOURNAL would again lift its head above the conflagration. I inclose five dollars to pay what is due, and give me credit for the rest. I will try and get some new subscribers who will pay in advance.

WEST LA FAYETTE, OHIO.—Joseph Burr writes.—Although my subscription to the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL has not yet run out, yet I deem it proper to continue the paper, and to pay in advance. So good a paper must go down for want of support. The articles from the pen of Dr. Wm. Fahnestock and Dr. H. T. Childs are worth the subscription price. I live remote from a spiritual society, and am not myself a confirmed Spiritualist, and can not raise you even one additional subscriber. If you could induce a few test mediums or fair speakers to call with me and stay as long as suits their convenience, I presume I could soon find you patrons. I reside in a village, close to a station, on the [illegible] Chicago and St. Louis R. R., and presume many mediums and speakers pass on that road, but unfortunately, are not much known to Spiritualists. Why is eastern Ohio so neglected by your friends? No uncultivated soil offers better prospects. Inclosed you will find a post office order for three dollars, which you will please place to my credit.

FOREST, OHIO.—S. Howe writes.—I have taken the JOURNAL three months on trial and like it very much. I do not know of any religious paper that suits me better. I admire the course you pursue, so I will renew my subscription for one year from the commencement since the big fire. I think my three months were out when the office was burned. I want to see the conclusion of the "Search after God." I will keep watch to see if I can find any more who will send for the JOURNAL.

PARISH, N. Y.—Ezra Thayer writes.—Inclosed you will find $2.50. You will receive it gratis on account of your misfortune in the late fire. You will let my present subscription stand till it expires next May, then I will renew. I am now almost 82 years of age. I am scarred a living through my natural life, but that which I give for spiritual or benevolent purposes I have to procure by my individual efforts. The money I send you I obtained by husking corn. If it had been a larger sum, you would have had it just as freely. I purchase my spiritual books and other publications similar to the way I obtained means to send you. I have been a Spiritualist about fifteen years. My mind was agitated about twenty years since. Some fifteen years ago I was troubled with an attack of inflammatory rheumatism, and the spirits came and healed me. Since that time I have not been troubled with that disease. This convinced me of spirit power and spirit life, and I have been no skeptic since. I know my friends who have gone on, are yet alive, and are only transferred. I see them, and feel them, and talk with them, and sometimes they give me an electrical shock, especially since the time I was partially paralyzed. My experience teaches me that Dr. Edmeston is right. His theory may be true, but in my case it has not been proved so.

Venerable brother, we appreciate all you say, and place your $2.50 to the credit of the Widow's and Orphan's Fund, and hope you will forward names to whom you would like to have us send the JOURNAL free.—ED. JOURNAL.

VOLNEY, IOWA.—S. Candee writes.—Inclosed find post office order for five dollars, to be disposed of according to your liking. My subscription to the JOURNAL is paid to the 24th of March, 1872. If the JOURNAL rises from the ashes to be as good as in times past, I shall be abundantly rewarded, whether I get it or not.

REMARKS.—Thank you, brother. Three dollars we use to renew your subscription, and two dollars we credit to the Widow's and Orphan's Fund.

DAVENPORT, IOWA.—David S. Fuller writes. I received your little JOURNAL, and was sorry to hear that the office was burned, but the friends must help start it again, for I feel as though I can not do without it. It is the first thing I think of when I go to the post office. I wish I was able to help you more, but it is all I feel able to do. Please to accept this five dollars as a present to help start the JOURNAL with, and to further the cause of progression and truth.

Thank you. It is credited to the Widow's and Orphan's Fund.—ED. JOURNAL.

ST. LOUIS, MO.—R. D. Goodwin, M.D., writes. In response to your call for aid, I herewith send you five dollars and my blessing for your determination to continue the JOURNAL. I trust it will not be long before I see its bright face again. I am lost without it, and can not supply the want of it in any way.

OTTAWA, IOWA.—Kinsey Jordan writes.—Inclosed find five dollars. Credit to my account, and keep the ball rolling.

KNIGHTSTOWN, IND.—Dr. J. H. Hill writes. Inclosed I send one dollar and forty cents, to pay for the JOURNAL for five months, which paper was so suddenly and unexpectedly devoured by the fire king, which has swept so destructively over your great city.

RAYMOND, IOWA.—Mrs. M. E. Engle writes.—We received your little sheet with the greatest pleasure, and "devoured" it with the most rapid avidity, scarcely being able to wait until we could deposit baby safely away. [illegible]

ROUND TOP, TEXAS.—H. Ledbetter writes.—Your appeal for help has reached me, and as a reader of your paper, with a paid subscription for some months to much, mine is as follows: You will find inclosed $2.50, which credit as directed.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.—T. Snow writes.—Inclosed you will find a three dollar post office order to renew my subscription for the JOURNAL. Let every one throw in their mite, as did the widow—for the Religio-Philosophical Journal will go on with the fight, until all the evils of old theology are kicked higher than a kite.

FRANKFORT, KY.—E. Whitesides writes.—I received your circular, giving an account of the great loss of life and property in your city a short time since by fire, and among the rest, the JOURNAL office. I mourn the paper very much; but hope it will not be long before we shall have it again. Inclosed please find money order for six dollars.

DANSVILLE, N. Y.—A. Quigley writes.—I respond to your appeal by sending you two new subscribers and repay my subscription. Let the time commence with the resurrection of the JOURNAL.

LA SALLE, ILL.—C. C. Davis writes.—It seems that our familiar friend and visiter, the JOURNAL, has been licked up by the awful fire, and that you are true to the caption of the paper in this, that you are going to work in a "philosophical" manner to resurrect it. You are showing strong faith in your Saviour, and great energy, which, however, merely goes toward keeping good the manifest energy of your previous efforts in building up and sustaining so good a paper as the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. Count on me for a full year's subscription, at least, dating Aug. 22nd, which I shall forward you during Nov.

VALLEY MILLS, W. VA.—N. H. Colson writes. I have just received your little sheet of Oct. 9th, giving an account of your severe loss by the fire, and I hasten to renew my subscription, as the best I can do for you at present. You will please find inclosed post office order for three dollars, for one year's subscription.

BUFFALO, N. Y.—B. Sully writes.—I have been very negligent in sending your dues for the JOURNAL. I here send six dollars to pay up arrears, and to renew. We feel bad for you in this great loss, but hope it will not been so slow as ourself in answering your call.

DELPHOS, OHIO.—G. W. Hall writes.—Your appeal for aid came duly to hand, but, being absent on business, caused some delay on my part, to aid you. But it is never too late to aid a brother in distress. I send $7.50, which credit as directed.

WELLINGTON, OHIO.—Zera Rawson writes.—I received your letter or circular. I was glad to hear you are alive, and in as good and comfortable quarters as you are. I hope you will soon be in running order again. I send you a check for five dollars to credit my account, and want you to send the paper as soon as you can.

VERDI, KANSAS.—J. A. Beam writes.—We were very sorry to hear of the burning of the JOURNAL office, and hope you will be able to continue in the field as a paper. We are very weary waiting for its welcome weekly visits. Herewith I send money order for three dollars, for renewal.

ETNA GREEN, IND.—A. H. Bushman writes.—In consequence of the blow you received from the fire, and the need of the JOURNAL amongst Spiritualists, every one interested should cast in their mite at the present time; for many prefer it to other spiritual papers.

WINONA, MINN.—Wm. B. Allen writes.—Please find inclosed five dollars, for which, give credit.

WINONA, MINN.—Jane M. Davis writes.—I can not find words to express the joy with which I received the little sheet, with the name of the JOURNAL on it. I was glad to find it still alive; also that it was going to live. I am truly sorry for your loss, but glad your life is spared to start the paper again. I wish I had plenty of money, how soon would I hand some over for your use, but the mite I have to spare I send.

FENN'S MILLS, MICH.—James McCormick writes.—I admire your courage, and think, with such a spirit at the head, we shall soon see the smiling face of our dear JOURNAL again. I am a trial subscriber. I send you six dollars; three of which you may apply on subscription, and the other three for the JOURNAL, to be sent to G. C. McCormick, Ransomville, N. Y.

COLUMBUS, GA.—C. H. Jones writes.—Your little, diminished sheet of Oct. 9th, came to hand to-day. It makes me feel sad to see the proportions of the glorious old JOURNAL so reduced. When I saw the accounts of the suffering in Chicago, my soul was sad, but when I read what a noble work we all mankind went to your rescue with the comforts of life, I said, "Glory to God in the highest; this is not total depravity; this is that brotherly love that will save the race. When I saw that the theatres in New York were playing for the benefit of the suffering of your city, I could but ask was the Church doing as much. Here is a poor fellow's two dollars—I wish it was double as much, to help the JOURNAL back to life again.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.—Albert Shroeder writes. Inclosed find two dollars for the JOURNAL. I am sorry that I can not send more just now, but I shall forward you more soon. I hope that all will do the manly part. I thank you kindly for past favors, and hope that you may soon be able to start the dear old JOURNAL again.

VERNON, MICH.—E. J. Garner writes.—In answer to the appeal for all true friends of Spiritualism to renew their subscriptions for the JOURNAL, I inclose three dollars. I hope there will be new efforts put forth by all lovers of truth, to establish it on a sure foundation, and may the angels guide and direct you.

BUDA, ILL.—J. N. Pervier writes.—Inclosed find six dollars, which will pay for the paper until Feb. 1873.

NEW YORK CITY.—Albert Day writes.—Some of the clergy in New York are rejoiced that the recent fire has occurred. Dr. Thompson is one among the very wise, for they know that God directed the whole conflagration. The clergy assume to know all about God's proceedings, and are in intimate communion with the devil, if any reliance can be placed upon their assertions; but I am not aware that any professed Spiritualist has received any message from his Satanic Majesty. I am not disposed to deny that the clergy have held communion with their alleged devil for ages past, and I give them all the credit they claim for good taste in their selection of their society. The fiendish assertions of the churches show conclusively that they are in constant communion with satanic spirits.

GREEN GARDEN, ILL.—C. Hutson writes.—No. 5 of the JOURNAL came to hand all safe, and a more welcome number never has been received. Brother, your sympathies, our inmost soul is with you, and if we had this world's goods, we would help you. I send you inclosed four dollars, to pay what I owe, and three dollars, to renew my subscription for a year.

LA PORTE, IND.—Sada Bailey writes.—I will send to you three dollars from my own light purse, even though I sacrifice some personal comforts, yes, even necessities. Please send the JOURNAL to some poor, burned-out family in Chicago with this year's subscription.

WOODLAND, CAL.—J. Hollingsworth writes.—Inclosed please find forty-six dollars for a club of twelve. I have been running round ever since I got your call for help, and this is the best I can do up to this time. If it were not that I know you are in need of all you can get at the shortest notice, I would not send this paltry sum, but would keep on trying to get more subscribers. I am truly sorry to hear of your hard luck, but go ahead with the paper. It will not do to let it stop; it would be as bad as putting us on half rations. I believe from the expression that I hear from Spiritualists, that your paper will be better sustained in the future than it has been in the past. May good angels and kind spirits ever assist you in your noble work, and all Spiritualists send in their mite, as they should do, and I hope you will soon recover from your losses. I believe the spirit world is in sympathy with our cause. May the JOURNAL live to give old theology and priesterafi many hard blows in the future, as it has done in the past.

BUXTON, ILL.—George Shumway writes.—As long letters is not my forte, and I presume not what you need at present, I will just state that I feel your loss very much. I will inclose five dollars, which if you get, please give me credit, and send on the JOURNAL, as soon as you commence publishing.

HILLSDALE, MICH.—F. W. Merritt writes.—I should have written before this time and sent you your dues for the JOURNAL, but I had to scrape hard to get it together. I now send you a ten dollar money order, which you will please place to my account.

HOPEDALE, MASS.—Richard Walker writes.—I received your circular of Oct. 9th, and learned by it that it was as I feared, that you were burned out; but I was glad that you were determined to start the paper again, and I solicited aid from your old subscribers. To that end I here inclose five dollars, for the continuation of my subscription. I wish you to let my former subscription be canceled, as I consider it burned by the fire.

TROY, IND.—Anton and Eliza Hochweber write.—Please accept this small sum of four dollars, three for the renewal of the JOURNAL, and one for assistance.

FORT PLAIN, N. Y.—Mrs. Kate L. Vanderwear writes.—Inclosed please find three dollars as a subscription for the JOURNAL. I never saw but one copy, but liked it very much.

HARRODSBURG, KY.—O. S. Poston writes.—My subscription expired the 12th of last September. I send three dollars to renew my subscription for one year from that time. I deeply sympathize with all the Chicago sufferers, and trust that they and yourself will soon be resurrected. Spirit, the great spiritual battle must go on. I am doing all I can in my district of country.

PHILADELPHIA, PENN.—Jacob Foster writes. Inclosed please find five dollars, that I will give toward replacing your loss by the great fire.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.—J. Holland writes. I shall do all that I can to aid in establishing your valuable paper, and I hope that all men who are true to their faith, and all women who love liberty and justice, will do all that is right to assist in this work of love. Ten dollars inclosed—credit it as directed.

CROSSWICK, N. J.—S. Taylor writes.—Inclosed you will find an order for ten dollars. You will please give me credit for three dollars, the remaining seven use at discretion.

PROSPECT HILL, WI.—John Boyd writes.—I have just received your circular, giving an account of your total loss by the great conflagration which recently befell your city. I like the paper very much, and hope to see it have a wider circulation. I will here inclose three dollars, to pay for one year more.

JOLIET, ILL.—Mary L. Millspaugh writes.—The fire was the theme for two discourses here, in two of our churches, and at the Baptist church the speaker was a lawyer. During his remarks, he charged this terrible calamity that has fallen upon Chicago, to the Lord. He said that the Lord made those scoundrels set that fire. If this is true, I think the Lord had better change localities with the devil, for as much of a fiend as his Satanic Majesty is represented to be, he never would have done so mean a thing as that.

AURORA, ILL.—John Darrah writes.—Receiving your little sheet dated Oct. 9th made me feel very queer, I assure you, still I was glad to get it, as I did not know your address. Find four dollars and fifty cents inclosed. Use as directed.

GENEVA, WIS.—Matilda Snow writes.—Inclosed please find one dollar, that being all I have to spare just at present, as I am unemployed, and will draw any more until December. I then intend to renew my subscription for the paper, as it comes like angel's visits in my home. You have the sympathy of the entire spiritual community in your great loss.

BELLEVILLE, ILL.—E. W. Primm writes.—I can not tell you how much I miss the JOURNAL. May I not expect to be again in regular receipt of it soon? Oct. 5th, I mailed you a check for five dollars. I trust it reached you. Should your paper be again published, I hope to receive it. What is all. I have found more pleasure in reading it than I can express. The burning of Chicago caused me loss and trouble. I could have borne it all with more patience to the JOURNAL. Inclosed find letter-heads no reply. Accept my hearty sympathies in your present trials.

BLOOMINGDALE, MICH.—Mary B. Edgerton writes.—Will you please accept one dollar? It is a small sum at this trying time.

PALATINE, ILL.—David Beach writes.—Keep the ball rolling, brother. Spiritualism is not to be burned out. All other isms are mortal and must perish. The spiritual JOURNAL, where I saw how all mankind went to your rescue with the comforts of life, I said, "Glory to God in the highest; this is not total depravity; this is that brotherly love that will save the race. When I saw that the theatres in New York were playing for the benefit of the suffering of your city, I could but ask was the Church doing as much. Here is a poor fellow's two dollars—I wish it was double as much, to help the JOURNAL back to life again.

WICHITA, KANSAS.—W. E. Campbell writes.—Inclosed please find three dollars, which you will please place to my subscription with the JOURNAL. I am sorry to learn of the destruction of the greatest "light house" of America, the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House.

FULTON CITY, ILL.—W. Stowell writes.—I hasten to drop a few lines to ask a few questions. First, are you entirely ruined? Second, if not, are you going to start your valuable paper again? Third, if so, how soon may I expect one? Now I tell you, I am lost for the want of the JOURNAL. It was our delight to get it at the office, and the contents were devoured in preference to all other papers which I receive, and I have three other weeklies beside the JOURNAL, so you can judge for yourself how lonely we are without it.

REMARKS.—We regret that some of our subscribers failed to get our miniature papers. It is not to be wondered at, however, when it is realized that our post office facilities were very much impaired by the fire.

YATES CITY, ILL.—Charles Roberts writes.—My sympathy is with you in your great misfortune. I herewith send you my mite in the shape of a three dollar subscription for the ensuing year.

WAVERLY, N. Y.—N. Kinney writes.—I herewith inclose a subscription list for the JOURNAL, and post office money order for $35.50, to cover amount, which will probably help you in your calamity. I hope the efforts of the friends of the good cause will be such as to make the great misfortune a blessing, double the number of papers sent amongst the thinking portion of the earth, as it is, to have the good cause of Spiritualism. Credit amount as directed;

WATERBURY, N. Y.—L. D. Olney writes.—Your circular came to hand. In reply I inclose for a renewal for another year, and hope before long to add to your list of subscribers. We feel the loss of your valuable paper very much, more so than we should any little one of the right set, as it is to have in our family. We have completed our arrangements for a course of six lectures the coming winter, by E. V. Wilson. We challenge the clergy to debate with him. They dare not come to time.

Hydrogen and its Compounds; Formation of Rain; Explosive Nature of Hydrogen and Oxygen; Oxy-Hydrogen, Lime, Light; Metals that Decompose Water at Different Temperatures.

Hydrogen was first described in 1766; it is a colorless, odorless, tasteless, irrespirable gas sixteen times lighter than the atmosphere; and though highly inflammable, a non-supporter of combustion. It is abundantly distributed throughout all the kingdoms of mundane nature, yet never found in a free and uncombined state, at or near the earth's surface.

Combining with oxygen in the proportion of two volumes of hydrogen to one of oxygen, or one atom in weight of hydrogen to eight atoms of oxygen, it forms the well-known grand balance relation—water. Hydrogen and oxygen in their normal state being non-conductors, will not combine, hence the evaporization of water virtually gives off hydrogen, which, being sixteen times lighter than the lower atmosphere, rises into a super-strata, forming, under favoring circumstances, immense bodies of dry hydrogen, continuously accumulating in its non-conducting state, and leaving the oxygen to accumulate in a substrata nearer the surface of the earth in a similar state. When the two bodies of gas come in oppressive contact with each other, so as to produce a a temperature of a thousand degrees of heat, or the electric spark, both bodies at once become conductors of their repective measures of electrical force, and preluded with lightning and thunder combine, condensing both gases, which descends to the earth in the form of rain. Should the atmosphere be humid and offer a better conducting medium at a reduced temperature, as in winter the interchange takes place without lightning and thunder. Water kept quiet may be reduced below the freezing temperature, yet if shaken it will freeze, and in the act of freezing raise the temperature to the freezing point.

Two proportions of hydrogen to one of oxygen, brought together at an equitable temperature, or under the impress of the electric spark, give us the many wonderful experiments usually made with oxy-hydrogen gas. If two inverted glass jars are filled, one with a mixture of two proportions of hydrogen to one of oxygen and the other with hydrogen alone, and a flame be applied to the mouth of the first jar will cause a terrific explosion; if applied to the second jar, the portion of hydrogen coming in contact with the atmosphere will burn with a pale white flame—and if the flame of a candle be pressed up into the hydrogen it will be extinguished.

The oxy-hydrogen gas—two of hydrogen to one of oxygen when brought together in those proportions at an ignitable temperature, will fuse and burn any and all of the metals as fire would burn shavings, except lime and magnesia—the lime, especially when brought between the charcoal points of a powerful electric current, or of oxy-hydrogen gas at an ignitable point in the meeting currents as in the compound blow pipe, it burns with the most dazzling and wonderfully intense electric light a single jet of which, centered on lime, if sufficiently elevated, may be seen one hundred miles.

Hydrogen, through its own chemical experiments, has the capacity of making musical sounds on passing through glass tubes. It plays a remarkable part in the component of all the acids, oxyds, and alkalies, and particularly in the most singular and suggestive waters of crystallization. Water absorbs considerable proportions of the atmosphere, and owes its relishable taste to this fact, as may be proved by drinking water, from which all the interstitial atmosphere has been expelled by boiling, and in which even a fish cannot live for want of proper aeration.

Per-oxyd of hydrogen, which contains two proportions of oxygen to one of hydrogen, bleaches and destroys all vegetable colors, and when placed in contact with most of the solid substances it is decomposed or re-dissolved into oxygen and water.

1st. Water is decomposed at a temperature of thirty-two degrees, with a lively effervescence by the metals potassium, sodium, lithium, barium, strontium, calcium, and magnesium.

2nd. Water is decomposed slowly at two hundred and twelve degrees, or boiling heat, by the metals, aluminium, glucinium, thorium, yttrium, zerconium, lanthanum, cerium, and magnesium.

3rd. Water is decomposed at red heat, or at common temperatures by strong acids, by the metals, iron, nickle, cobalt, cadmium, tin, chromium, and vanadium.

4th. Water is decomposed in its vaporous form by red heat, but not at common temperatures of strong acids by the metals, tungsten, molybdenum, osmium, columbium, titanium, arsenic, antimony, tellurium and uranium.

5th. Water is decomposed at red heat, but feebly by copper, lead and bismuth, yet their oxyds are not reducible to the metalic state by heat alone.

6th. Water is decomposed alone by the oxyds of the following metals at very high temperatures: silver, mercury, gold, palladium, platinum, rhodium and irridum. Yet these metals do not decompose water under any circumstance.

Among the various means of procuring hydrogen, we mention the gun barrel process because of its inexpensive commonplace simplicity, and more especially, because of its apt suggestions, as to the cause of steam boiler explosions.

Let us take a gun barrel open at both ends, attach a Florence flask partly filled with water by a tube to one end of the barrel and another tube at the other end passing through water into a receiver. Place a spirit lamp under the flask containing the water and three or four large spirit lamps under the gun barrel, which is supposed to be resting horrizontally and suitable supports. By the time the water is converted into steam, or state of decomposition of water, it passes through the gun barrel which, being heated to redness, absorbs the oxygen from the passing steam, and thus allows the hydrogen to pass on into the receiver. The reason for this affinity is very evident, there being three degrees of electrical difference between the oxygen of the water and the iron, while there is but four degrees of electrical difference between the hydrogen of the water and the iron. And the same law applies in its comparative polar force to all the metals in their effects at various temperatures upon water.

Under the head of Hydrogen and its Compounds, we submit a brief series of suggestions on the subject of STEAM BOILER EXPLOSIONS.

Water is composed of hydrogen and oxygen. Hydrogen has forty degrees or electrical measures of positive force. Oxygen has but one degree or electrical measure of positive force. This gives forty degrees of affinity between them. As gases under ordinary temperatures, they are non-conductors, and will not unite. As gases, however, at a temperature of a thousand degrees (the heat of flame) they become conductors and give up their respective measures of electric condition in the form of instantaneous explosion—such as we find in the phenomenon of lightning, thunder, and rain, the ultimate conditions being precisely the same.

At temperature of two hundred and twelve degrees, water is decomposed and converted into steam. If we pass the vapor of steam through a red-hot gun barrel, the red-hot iron absorbs the oxygen of the steam and allows the hydrogen to pass. This is the ordinary way of procuring hydrogen in the chemical laboratory. If we transfer the process to the steam boiler, we find the same facts and forces there. The supply pipes fail, the water decreases, the heat increases, the flues become red-hot,—absorb a proportion of the oxygen; and on reaching a point at which the two gases become conductors in the boilers, they explode, as in the compound blow pipe and other well-known experiments with hydrogen. The explosion being of the most terrific character, or, as we might more naturally say, the explosion of condensed lightning and thunder.

If we take a number of leaden jars and a brass ball insulated on a glass handle with few iron spikes inserted in the ball and projecting forward, and if we hold the spike points of the ball in the blue steam escaping from the safety valve of a steam boiler, we may, by collecting, changing, and discharging the electricity unto the leaden jars, collect enough electricity to kill an elephant across the continent, if properly insulated and conducted. This proves electricity to be the life or grand balance desideratum upon which water is based; it proves electricity to be the basis of polar condition; and it proves polar condition to be the same of motion in matter.

Thus far we may follow the demonstrative plead of positive analysis. All beyond this can but be the deduction of comparative reasoning.

We would extend our remarks on the subject of steam explosions, but let those submitted suffice for the present, hoping to have furnished a basis for the general deductions of each mind interested. Should engineers desire more information in point, however, I may soon publish a lecture on the subject, I had the honor to deliver before the Engineers' Association of St. Louis, in April, 1866.

Systematic Benevolence.

DEAR BROTHER AND SISTER SPIRITUALISTS: There are, no doubt, many of you who, like myself, have often wished to be doing something to aid in the spread of the beautiful Spiritual Philosophy. Having felt its power in your own souls, in setting you free from the bondage of creed and superstition, and in dispelling the gloom, which, as an effect of your former views and instructions, hung like a dark pall over the change called death, and which now you realize to be only one of the changes incident to life, you desire that others shall drink of this same fountain of happiness, and that the rays of light which have shone into your souls from the spirit world may also enlighten other hearts. There is one way in which we may all aid in preaching the glorious gospel of truth to the world, and that is by contributing of our means.

Whether we be rich or poor, with but the one talent or with ten, it matters not, we can do something and give something, and if we adopt some system of giving we shall be surprised ourselves at the great results.

I have a plan to lay before you, which is simply this: Procure a little box, either of wood or pasteboard, and close it up securely, leaving merely a little slit in the top to receive the "mites." Then inscribe on this box, "Family Missionary Box; its receipts to be devoted to the advancement of Spiritualism." Then set this on your mantel where you will see it yourself each day, and where others who visit you may see it, and if they feel disposed to contribute to it, or perhaps be induced to go home and imitate your example. Make it a practice to give each day, if it be only a penny, and you will discover a habit of systematic benificence growing upon you; also an increasing love for the cause which ought to be dear to us all. And now as to the disposal of the money thus raised. Let us open our boxes twice a year, or oftener if need be, say during the months of January and July, and forward the contents to Brother S. S. Jones, of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, the same to be acknowledged by him through a column of his paper devoted to that purpose, and disbursed by him in the interest of Spiritualism, as for instance in sending out lecturers, in spreading abroad our books and papers and tracts, and whatever way may promise the largest and best results for our cause.

Will you try this plan, dear brothers and sisters in the work? It is a system of giving that we can easily adopt. It will not impoverish us, but with the blessing of the angel world will enrich us spiritually if not temporally. It will keep alive our interest in, and our love for, the cause, and will be in itself one of the most effective ways of praying "Thy kingdom come." Hoping to gain a response from some of you in regard to this plan, or some other similar to it, and modifying it, I remain your brother in the cause of truth, H. A. B.

Brooklyn, N. Y., October 30th, 1871.

Miss Fox.

We have had the pleasure of an interview with Miss Fox, who has recently arrived in London, accompanied by Miss Ogden, an American lady who is traveling with her. A special interest is attached to this lady on account of the fact that she was the first spiritual medium, as it was in her father's house that the "knockings" were first interrogated and intelligent responses obtained. We found her an affable, pleasing lady, of medium stature, whose general appearance is faithfully represented in the engraving of her attached to No. 7 of Mrs. Hardinge's "History of Modern Spiritualism;" in which publication may also be found an account of the advent of Spiritualism in the Fox family, and the sufferings they had to undergo because of their mediumship. We understand that Miss Fox will receive no invitations as a professional medium. Her expenses have been defrayed by Mr. Livermore, and she will only give sittings in those families which may be privileged with her visits. This information appears to be necessary on account of the many pressing invitations which Miss Fox is receiving to give seances. In another place we furnish an account of the phenomena which have occurred through her mediumship. Her arrival in this country has excited a great deal of interest, which is not to be wondered at, seeing the momentous issues that have proceeded from the very unusual movement which took its rise in her early home.—The Medium and Daybreak.

List of Lecturers.

HEREAFTER we shall keep a standing register of such speakers as are furnished to us BY THE PARTIES INTERESTED, with a pledge on their part that they will keep us posted in regard to changes; and in addition to that, expressly indicate a willingness to aid in the circulation of the JOURNAL, both by word and deed.

Let us hear promptly from all who accept this proposition, and we will do our part faithfully.

The Psalms of Life.

A COMPILATION OF

Psalms, Hymns, Anthems, Chants, etc.,

Embodying the Spiritual, Progressive, and Reformatory Sentiment of the Present Age.

BY JOHN S. ADAMS.

This work has been prepared with special reference to the large and increasing demand for a volume expressing the sentiments and views of the advanced minds of the present times, and meeting the requirements of every species of Reform. It is entirely free of Sectarianism, of all the theological dogmas of the past, and fully recognizes the presence and ministration of spirit in every condition of life on earth.

This book contains five hundred and twenty-two choice selections of poetry, with suitable music on each page from Handel, Hadyn, Mozart, and other Distinguished Composers.

It combines the advantage of "Hymn" and "Tune" each. It is prefaced with a Classification of Subjects, and Complete Indexes of First Lines, Tunes, and Metres, and being of convenient size, is generally accepted as the Standard Music Book of Spiritualism, Radicalism, and general Reform.

Alike desirable for the LECTURE-ROOM and the HOMES OF THE PEOPLE.

"I think there is in the book a greater proportion—I think I ought to say a greater amount—of beautiful and truly spiritual poetry than in any other collection I have seen, whatever the size of the volume."

Rev. John Pierpont.

A Book for Women.

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M. D.

A Book by a Woman, For Women, On Diseases of the Sex.

The Liberal Christian, says:

After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had of its class. It is written for women; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for anybody indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to this subject. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country.

Harpers Magazine says:

We wish the chapter "Confidential to Mothers," might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land.

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours.

Godey's Lady's Book says:

This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class that we have yet seen.

Price, $1.50; postage, 16 cents. For sale at the office of this paper.

TERMS OF THE
Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3.00 per year, in Advance—$3.50 at end of year.
☞ Fifty cents for Three Months on Trial,
TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

Religio-Philosophical Publishing House.

All letters and communications should be addressed to S. S. JONES, 150 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or POST-OFFICE MONEY ORDER, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but always to a Registered Letter. The registration fee has been reduced to fifteen cents, and the present registration system has been found, by the postal authorities, to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. ALL Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so by the sender.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL should be careful to state whether it be for a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

Papers are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names ENTERED on the subscription books, without the first payment in advance.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expirations of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, without further reminder from this office.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to 1 Dec. 1871, it will be mailed, "J. Smith 1 Dec'l." If he has only paid to 1 Dec. 1870, it will stand thus: "John Smith 1Dec'0."

CHICAGO, NOVEMBER 25, 1871.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

The Chicago Conflagration—That Proclamation—The Cause of Crime—A Strange Vision.

(NUMBER LXII.)

The fire which destroyed to a great extent Chicago, has taught an important lesson,—one long to be remembered. Now in ruins, now a smouldering mass, it points significantly toward an avenging God, who, it is said, ordered this visitation that the citizens here might learn a lesson in humility. Michigan and Wabash Avenues, where the wealthy and aristocratic nabobs of the city resided, now present an entire different appearance. But a short time ago, you might have seen spacious parlors and rooms furnished in costly styles,—with velvet carpets, silk-cushioned chairs and settees, large mirrors ornamented with gold and resting in exquisitely carved frames, landscape paintings—in fact, they were supplied with everything that money could purchase, but humility. That was a foreign article. True, many worshiped this vindictive God in their churches, and supposed as they retired to rest at night in their comfortable quarters, that they were specially favored. But now the scene has changed. Those who were wealthy yesterday, are poor to-day. Those who could count their earthly gains by millions but a few weeks ago, have at last felt the avenging hand of ——, and those who have not lost all, have greatly suffered, and have been compelled to deprive themselves of many of the luxuries of life. Parlors on these avenues have been rented for offices, grocery stores, and for banks. What a change! What a metamorphosis! Yesterday indulging in luxuries from every cline, enjoying the comforts of wealth,—to-day so poor that they are compelled, perhaps, to accept of the bread of charity.

The religious world have gazed on the ruins of Chicago, as they did on those of Athens, Ninevah, Babylon and other ancient cities, regarding its destruction as caused through the instrumentality of an avenging God. Mayor Mason, of this city, to whom we alluded in a previous article, sent forth his Bull,—his proclamation, in the following language:

> In view of the recent appalling public calamity, the undersigned, Mayor of the city of Chicago, hereby earnestly recommends that all the inhabitants of this city do observe Sunday, Oct. 29th as a special day of humiliation and prayer; of humiliation for those past offenses against Almighty God to which these afflictions are doubtless intended to lead our minds; of prayer for the relief and comfort of the suffering thousands in our midst, for the restoration of our material prosperity, especially for our lasting improvement as a people in reverence and obedience to God. Nor should we, even amid our losses and sorrows, forget to render thanks to Him for the arrest of the devouring flames in time to save so many houses, and for the unexampled sympathy and aid which has flowed in upon us from every quarter of our land, and even from beyond the seas.

Mayor Mason, no doubt, is a religious man. Perhaps he prays, not as the New York officials pray, but as Jesus did when he left his apostles and sought a retired place and there venerated "His Father in Heaven." If prayer does his soul good, if fasting promotes his prosperity, and enables him to appear more acceptable in the sight of God, we advise him to indulge in such a practice.

The Mayor charges the citizens of this city as being guilty of grevious offenses against God, but fails to specify wherein. Come, Mayor Mason, don't deal in general terms,—be specific. Collect together the divines of this city,—make Robert Collyer chairman, and Robert Laird Collier, Secretary, and let that august body draw up their bill of indictment against the people of this city, and present it to the Grand Jury in heaven,—have them arrested, tried by an impartial jury of angels, and sentenced to be confined with Belzebub in the infernal regions, until they shall reform. We read the proclamation and then put it in our scrap book as one of the curiosities of literature. We regard it equal in audacity to the anathemas of Pope Pius IX. On the day mentioned, we did n't humiliate ourselves; we did n't pray; we did n't fast, only as we feasted ourselves to a delicious dinner; nor did we return thanks to God Al Mighty for arresting the flames, thus saving so many houses, for we do not think he had anything to do with it. The Fire Fiend had swept the whole North Side away, and was then proceeding southward, and would have consumed the whole city, had not several buildings been blown up with powder. It was powder, water, and the energy of man that saved the city from complete destruction.

But we are appalled as we write. The cry of poverty strikes upon our ear so sadly, so despondently, that we weep. Those who had happy, comfortable homes, surrounded with the fruits of years' of toil, had it swept away. Out in the cold rain, in the damp air they stood, objects of charity, ready to accept of any proffered assistance. The scene was appalling. It makes the strong, resolute heart falter, to think of it. And that fearful Monday night that followed,—a veil of sorrow enshrouded Chicago. Five hundred births in the tents or less secure places! A mother clasping to her bosom the wailing new-born infant! Three hundred little boxes made to inclose those who died! Three hundred graves made to receive their remains! Three hundred mothers' hearts tortured with pain and anxiety! A devil could not look upon such a scene and not shed tears. To think of it causes a cold chill to pass over us. Horrible night! A massacre of the innocents! A wholesale butchery of those whose hearts knew no guile. Oh! the Fire Fiend. God's Angel of Destruction, why visit this populous city? But was not this a sad picture? Was it not enough for God in one night to level Chicago to the ground, dissipate her wealth, destroy her terraced columns, her beautiful paintings and statuary? No! he sought Wisconsin—he applied the fire brand there! The flames were as devilish, as serpent-like there as here. They burst out at Peshtigo, Forestville—swept over the counties of Oconto, Brown, Door, Kewaunee and parts of Monitowoc and Outagamie. The number of lives lost cannot be correctly ascertained, but will, no doubt, reach several thousand.

In this city were the fruits of crime. Dark holes of licentiousness stood by the side of the churches, and while the ministers were interpreting the Bible, making exhortations or preaching a sermon, but a few feet away were the low and vile, the gambler, the buffoon, the harlot, collected together enjoying themselves on their plane of life. Here were gambling hells, palaces of prostitution, assignation houses which, veiled with respectability, it is said, received visits from ministers, editors, "pious scoundrels, religious devils and moral reprobates"—and as our spiritual eyes were opened one time, we saw Chicago as we never want to see it again,—and in our anguish we asked, What is purity? What is morality? What is virtue? What is Christianity? We saw the veil lifted from the heart of this great city, examined its pulsations, looked at it from every standpoint! We saw an ulcer, foul, dark, and putrid! Surely, Chicago is corrupt, we said as we gazed upon the scene. Our vision seemed to go in secret places, to penetrate the very soul of those who walked forth in the garb of humanity. All impure, all devilish, all living in one putrid ulcer, and must it be probed by fire to allow its rottenness to escape? And then the scene changed. We had been gazing only on those who were deeply steeped in sin, and when our guide told us that under like circumstances, pre-natal influences and conditions, all would have done like them,—we desired then to have him make a distinction between society,—to show us the dividing line between those who are pure, and those who are impure, and he would not do it,—his great, honest magnanimous heart gazed with equal pleasure upon the prostitute and the divine, upon the culprit and the man on bended knees! Who is to blame for this condition, we asked, and he wafted our spirit to a little flaxen-haired girl resting quietly on a couch. A night's debauch had rendered her weary. We gazed upon the scene with strange emotions, stood by the side of her in spirit, and drank in the influences around her. We saw on her face the sweet kisses of a mother given in times past; around her neck the arms of a doting father and sister. She was their child—was once idolized, happy. We then saw the conditions of her pre-natal existence,—and saw the seeds of this life sown there. Even back, back, back, generation after generation, we passed, tracing conditions which, finally culminated in this flaxen-haired girl! One generation did not make these conditions—it required ten!

What a lesson! We gazed upon her, listened to her quiet breathings, and impressed upon her mind the shadows of her once happy home. Oh! she is now dreaming—the impression has had an effect upon her exceedingly plastic nature, and the scenes of her old happy home became to her realities. The tears start—they come forth, and glisten on her cheeks, and that dream made her sad, and we saw her lips move and the words "mother, dear mother," are uttered! Wicked Chicago! Corrupt Chicago! Devilish Chicago! The vision learned us a lesson. The little flaxen-haired girl was presented to us as an example, and our guide said, "Pronounce no sentence upon her, neither condemn her. You have traced the causes to pre-natal life—you have gone back generation after generation, and found that which culminated in causing this beautiful girl to become debauched. Impure thoughts on the part of mothers bring crime into the world. Licentiousness, as the world calls it, is only a carbuncle, a festering canker, a putrid ulcer, that has been held in abeyance generation after generation, until it culminates in some particular individual. Blame that individual? No! Blame that sweet, flaxen-haired girl, because there is centered within her organism the influences which have been existing for ten generations, but were not fully developed, until she has brought into the world? No!

> "Time is a link in life's eternal chain,
> Yet incomplete, and death begins again
> To form the circlings of a life divine,
> From seal-beams gathered from the shores of time.
> Creation's cradle, where the unrolling soul,
> Submissive, bends to virtue's sweet control;
> Or else, though cultured ignorance, incline
> To spread the tendrils of a fruitless vine:
> And thus the world, from age to age, has rolled
> Through darkness dire and sorrowings untold.
> The selfish sire transmits to sordid son:
> The son, in blindness, bears the curses on.
> Till nations echo with the fearful cry:
> 'It is a dread and awful thing to die!'"

Our soul, as we were taught this lesson became grandly illuminated with a light divine! We were brought in close communion with the illustrious dead, and traced the life lines of connecting generations. Flaxen-haired girl, resting from a night's debauch, we hold you blameless! You inebriate, intoxicated with poisonous liquors, we will not point the finger of scorn at you! Noble, honest old man, we will not praise you! You philanthropist, whose whole life has been one page of good deeds, we have no words of approbation for you! Noble woman so full of love, charity and all that is pure and lovely, we shall not flatter you! Henceforth we condemn no one; we praise no one. Wicked Chicago, we will not censure you; moral Chicago, we will not praise you!

Oh, what a grand lesson! The heart of our guide seemed to be a temple of charity, and as we gazed upon its emotions, we saw him extend his arms lovingly around all humanity. Noble spirit, each thought a gem of purity going out to elevate the world! And while he goes forth to assist all, to scatter flowers around them, he utters no words of condemnation, hates no one, but with his eyes on the celestial glories of the Summer Land, he points each one to the grandeur thereof, and leads them forth as erring children, not blaming them, not chiding them, for he knows the cause that made them what they are. And thus he labors,—throwing over the erring the veil of charity, he leads them forth in the exalted paths of virtue, and he only frowns when he sees others condemn them. His life is one of continual devotion to humanity. An unostentatious name, simple in manners, and a world-loving spirit ever distinguishes him, and he comes to our side, and teaches us the grandest lessons of life.

TO BE CONTINUED.

Calamities; their Author or Cause. Is there a Compensation?

In our last issue we announced our intention to discuss the subject of so-called Evil. Recent calamities throughout the world have aroused a spirit of inquiry among the masses.

The authorship or cause of calamities is being inquired into. The motives of their author, if it be a Supreme Being, and the object to be attained should be made to appear.

The great mass of mankind being religionists of over eleven hundred different phases, they naturally look to their religious teachers to instruct them, by proper replies to these queries, as to the authorship, or cause, and object.

With almost one accord these religious teachers predicate their replies upon the idea of an angry God, against whom his creatures have sinned, and against whom he gratifies a revengeful spirit—a primitive idea which originated in the early ages of earth's inhabitants—which conception has been fostered and promulgated from generation to generation, and is the central idea in nearly all systems of religion throughout the world.

If we go back only to the Mosaic record—the Sacred Word of Judaism and Christianity—we are taught that for the sins of the first human beings, in eating that which they had been forbidden to partake of, he not only cursed them and the numberless myriads of the whole human family that should descend from them, but the very earth upon which we live. Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord—what a beginning!

Soon after Cain, from a spontaneous outburst of his destructiveness, which he inherited, slew his brother Abel. Again the malevolence of Moses's and the Christian's God is awakened, and he curses him and his sons. "Weak-minded Spiritualists" would, if they had been consulted, advised the Almighty to send him to school, and given him such an education as would have brought into action the higher faculties of the man, and thereby held in check his destructiveness to be used only in killing wolves and other dangerous wild beasts, or perchance the snake that beguiled his mother, Eve. But they were not consulted then any more than they are now by his vicegerents and ambassadors.

Next, we find that for the sins of the people the God of the universe got angry, and drowned the world. Again he, for like causes, burned Sodom and Gomorrah. For similar purposes he caused whole nations to be blotted out of existence, mothers and daughters to be ravished and enslaved. He caused famine and pestilence to stalk through the land. The earth to open and swallow up innocent women and children. In fine, all the calamities that befell the early nations of the earth were the direct work of the Almighty, or the indirect work by his agents, as in the case of the devil and old Grandfather Job, or the lying spirit he, God, sent forth to compel the prophets to give forth false prophecies.

It will hardly do to say that these stories were fallacies, believed in only by our grandfathers and grandmothers, so long as the same doctrine is preached from almost every popular pulpit of the present era.

The records referred to are said to be sacred writings, given by the inspiration of Almighty God, through the lips of holy men, and that it is blasphemy to even question the truth of the same.

If God used to so deal with mankind it is doubtless true (he being unchangeable), that he does the same thing to-day.

Is it to be wondered at, that those who pay a preacher to do their thinking, are content to receive such teachings, inasmuch as it is backed up by Holy Writ without questioning? Nay, more, is it to be wondered at that millions who have questioned the infallibility of the Bible have been tortured by the rack and flame unto death in all past ages, when such deeds of horror by almighty God are cited in justification?

The history of the world teaches the sad lesson that bigoted religionists are the most desperately cruel beings on the face of the earth. They have caused more human suffering than all other causes combined.

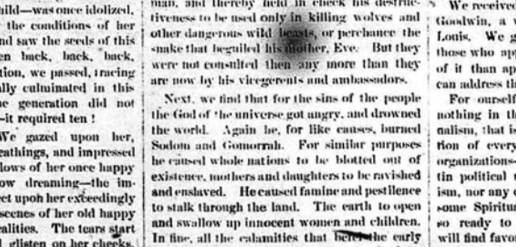
Such has been the case in all ages, so far as the world has any knowledge. The ushering in of the Christian Era was commenced (so says the record,) with the sacrificing upon the cross the life of the Nazarene, and followed by the most terrible butchery for centuries that that cruelty could conceive of. Sect warring against sect, each being as they claimed, the true followers of the Immaculate God.

Not to attempt to cite popular books of history to establish facts that are familiar to every school child, we make the broad assertion that the most terrible cruelty that the ingenuity of man could conceive of, has been employed by so-called Christians to execute the will of the God of the Bible, and bring heretics into a confession of the infallibility of the Bible and the church.

If these premises have been true during the whole history of religion in regard to the attributes and practices of an Almighty God, then it is doubtless true that God burned up Chicago, including innocent children and so-called houses of God to avenge himself on the wicked inhabitants of the city—and the same premises will hold true in regard to the consuming fires in Northern Wisconsin and Michigan—the same doctrine will hold true in regard to every calamity that ever befalls a nation or people. Hence all clergymen preaching upon the subject have done their exact duty in ascribing such devilish acts to Almighty God, and the Colliers as well as the few other devotees and worshippers of Moses' God and venerators of His Sacred Word, called liberal Christians, have come far short of consistency in thus failing to preach in accordance with the doctrines of Holy Writ.

They hold as sound the Divine Word, and yet dare not preach in accordance with its teachings, because it conflicts with science, philosophy and common sense. "Consistency thou art a jewel." Orthodoxy and liberal Christianity, both based upon the Bible as the Sacred Word of God. On the one side it is claimed that God burned Chicago to punish and get revenge (Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord,) upon sinners, as he did of old (He changeth not; he is the same yesterday, to-day and forever.) On the other hand, the same Bible Christians deny God's doing the terrible deed, but attribute it to "dry weather and high winds."

Old theology rejoins and says, however plausible the liberal Christian's argument may be it is not consistent with the "Revealed Word," which they adhere to and read from every Sabbath. And furthermore "carnal reason is dangerous" to follow. The rebutter of Brother Collier on behalf of Liberal Christianity has not yet been filed.



We shall pursue this subject further in due time.

ANOTHER ORGANIC MOVEMENT.

Mysticism.

BRO. JONES: The day is come for all to work. I know you will do your duty in helping on the glorious work now begun. All can act their part. Further information by applying to any member of a "Unit," or to your friend R. D. Goodwin, St. Louis, Mo., with return postage.

God be thanked the cloud is moving, and the silver lining is in view. R. D. GOODWIN.

We received the foregoing from Col. R. D. Goodwin, a very devoted Spiritualist, of St. Louis. We give it place in the JOURNAL for those who appreciate it or want to know more of it than appears upon the surface. Such can address the author as directed above.

For ourself we frankly say, we recognize nothing in this great movement called Spiritualism, that is not open to the free investigation of every thinking mind. No humbug organizations—national or local; no highfalutin political movement partaking of sectarianism, nor any other pretentious movement that some Spiritualists seem to long for, and are so ready to countenance, however absurd, will find favor in this JOURNAL.

We have given all such movements a fair bearing, so far as reporting what they have done and proposed to do.

All such movements have, thus far, been not only ephemeral, but a burlesque upon common sense, and generally conceived and brought forth by Rev. gentlemen who want position and have but little conception of spiritual philosophy.

Spiritualism is doing its work nobly despite all such movements. It counts more devotees than any religious sect, without organic effort, religious dogmas, or political partisanship.

Our philosophy being based in truth—is natural and harmonious with all other truths. Hence we feel that the work of Spiritualism is not to be done in a party—political nor religious. It is eclectic, it takes and uses that which is truthful and useful wherever it may be found. It culls from the best. It exerts its influence upon every class of society, and upon every individual. It aids in presenting the best men and women for official duties. It exerts its influence in liberalizing public sentiment. It is iconoclastic in showing the fallacy of all religious organizations based upon the errors of priests, who persist in teaching the dogmas of a vicarious atonement. It builds up in its stead a purer system of philosophy.

It would be as absurd to harness such a system of philosophy into a political party, as it would be to do the same thing with natural philosophy, geology, astronomy, or chemistry.

No, friends and brethren, let us stand above all such ephemeral combinations. Let us clasp hands with the intelligent denizens of the Spirit World, and with each other, in the open investigation of truth. Let us war manfully against error, and have no fear of any greater calamity befalling us than that of ignorance, superstition, bigotry and idolatry. Let it be distinctly understood that we raise no objections to, but have ever favored local organizations based upon such liberal articles of association as will enable communities by a joint effort to raise means to build halls, and support lectures and lyceums for the development and cultivation of the higher faculties of old and young, youth and middle aged, and bring all such into friendly local relations—sectarian or political—never.

While we have no fellowship for Col. Goodwin's movement, we think it quite as sensible as the resolves of the American Association of Spiritualists, at their late meeting at Troy, or those since adopted by their Executive Board, resolving to go to the polls and vote for the president of their society for President of the United States. Spiritualism as an organized body, should no more seek to control the votes of individuals than it should seek to provide creeds and confessions of faith for them. God forbid, that the time should ever come, when we have a religious party strong enough to control the Government of the United States, neither of sectarian Spiritualism, nor any other class of religionists. Already the voice of astraeism has been raised against us and our paper in the sessions of this same American Association of Spiritualists. One of its leaders has sought the columns of The Banner, to warn our cotemporary, the Banner of Light, against extending the hand of fellowship and courtesy to us and our paper. What might we expect if there was a great political party sufficiently strong to elect the president of such a body to the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States? Will all those who are familiar with the history of the intolerance of any and all religionists when in political power, stop and reflect upon the absurdity of such resolutions as before referred to, and those who are not thus familiar, post themselves upon the subject? A moment's reflection will make them realize the great truth that such puerile movements of would-be leaders in Spiritualism does more to bring our philosophy into contempt than all the preaching of Orthodox clergymen in the world. Their preaching makes men inquire into its truth—making a political party of it, makes sensible men and women abhor it.

Curing the Sick.

One of the most important demonstrations of spirit power both in modern and ancient times, is the diagnosing cases of sickness and curing the same by the laying-on of hands, or in some other remarkable manner, with a certainty that is entirely beyond the power or even comprehension of any of the schools of medicine.

The reports of so-called marvelous cures by the Nazarene and his followers, is abundantly sustained by parallel cases of the present day, through a multitude of healing mediums.

The mode of treatment may differ with different mediums, but the result is the same—the cure of the patient.

While all healing mediums are more or less successful in their profession,—some seem to have the power developed to an extent bordering upon the miraculous. It being so strange to us observers, that a lady like Mrs. A. H. Robinson, of Chicago, who has had no medical education, and in her normal state, is entirely destitute of the ability to diagnose or prescribe for the sick; and yet when seated for that purpose, while under spirit control, either in the presence of the sick person, or by holding a lock of their hair in her hand, she will instantly give a correct diagnosis and curative remedy. Indeed, her powers are such, that she can instantly tell a counterfeit from a genuine Bank-note by the simple touch without seeing it. These cures are daily being performed through her mediumship in every section of the country. The worst types of cases are never reported for the fear of embarrassing remarks by readers and skeptical neighbors, towards such patients so cured by spirit power.

That class of healers are frequently being developed, and millions of sick people have been cured by spirit power.

—Jno. R. Kelso, of Springfield, Mo., desires to make engagements to lecture on Spiritualism in support of the United States. Bro. Kelso is an ex-member of Congress, and is widely known as a military man. He is represented as an able expounder of our philosophy.

> "Can ye burn a truth in the martyr's fire,
> Or chain a thought in the dungeon dire,
> Or slay the soul when it soars away
> In glorious light from the moldering clay?
> The truth that liveth, the thought that grow,
> The spirit ascending—all answer, No!"

—In England, a majority of the persons signing the marriage register of the parish make their mark. A clergyman explains in a newspaper that this is "not due to illiteracy wholly, but that one in five of the persons who thus sign themselves in his parish, do so because they are too drunk to write.

—The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL is devoted to the arts, sciences, literature, romance, Spiritualism, and general reform. Many of its contributors rank with the profoundest thinkers and writers of the age. It is a large, eight-page weekly paper, and is nicely printed in clear type. Its motto is: "Truth wears no mask, bows at no shrine, seeks neither place nor applause; she only asks a hearing."—Mt. Vernon (Ill.) Statesman.

"—We know—you and I—that death has no place
In the limitless regions of infinite space;
We're on the earth and we're here for a while,
We then bask forever in God's radiant smile;
And if, while we're delving, we sometimes would look
Through the luminous page of the "Journal's" book,
We would learn from that volume, with wisdom so rife,
There can be no death where there's Infinite life."

—That good old veteran in the cause of Spiritualism, Dr. Samuel Underhill, writes to us that he "holds two circles a week here,"—"may remain a month." He is somewhere—we know he is, by his letter; but there being no place attached to his epistle, we cannot point out his location. He writes to us that he now believes in the "resurrection," and says (referring to the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL) "It is born again!" Will he send his address at once to this office. Several inquiring lady friends desire to know his whereabouts.

—RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.—This great Spiritualistic paper of the West, published at Chicago, was completely burned out, but is now on its feet again. Mr. Jones, the publisher, announces that "the great Spiritual paper will appear next week, full-size, re-instated amid the ruins of the greatest city, in more senses than one, that the world ever knew, will be read by more than one hundred thousand souls scattered broadcast throughout the world, with greater interest than it or any other Spiritual paper was ever read before." Mr. Jones continues to his losses by the great fire at $15,000.—Harro (Md.) Republican.

—Prof. R. Garter will lecture on the Harmonial Philosophy and kindred subjects. He is represented as a clear, logical, reasoner, and will do good wherever employed. The Adrian (Spiritualist) speaks of him as follows: "A letter from Prof. R. Garter, scholar, lecturer, and earnest reformer, informs us that he is just recovering from a protracted illness. He is ready and anxious to make engagements to lecture for some, three, or six months. Prof. Garter is a sound thinker, and said to be a pleasing and entertaining speaker. Give him a call, friends. His address is Coldwater, Mich.

—Spiritual photographs are the latest sensation in Ames township,—not that we by any means desire to convey the impression that Ames township is noted for sensations; but it is said to be a veritable fact that pictures of nature on faces can be seen on the window-panes of a certain dwelling in the neighborhood of Ames ville, which are not common to the windows, and which are not produced by mechanical means. This strange sight has been witnessed by a number of the most respectable citizens of that township who have visited the house, and who confess themselves unable to account for the strange phenomena.—Athens (Ohio) Messenger.

—Henry Ward Beecher calls upon God to "bless the theatres" for their benevolence to Chicago.—Ex.

Remarks.—We are glad to learn that this eminent divine has "called upon the Lord" to bless the theatres for their timely assistance in behalf of Chicago. If he had not earnestly requested him to do so he would probably have forgotten it. This God must feel delighted to see his clerical babies sending up petitions to his throne, requesting him to do this or that. We wonder if he understands his business. Or does he require prompters to awaken him from his sleepy habits to a realization of his duties? God "bless the theatres!" God bless everybody.

—Bro. J. O. Barrett, in his notes to the Banner of Light, writes as follows in reference to the "Mediumship of a fawn: "Mr. Hazeltine related to me the following incident that occurred in Rockford, about two years ago: A family by the name of Handy, living here in retired simplicity of association, owned a beautiful fawn, caught in these woods. It was the pet of Eva, a daughter then sixteen years old. They played together, caressing each other in the yard, like two children.—Eva and fawn. Eva was taken sick with a severe fever. She sank lower and lower; the physician gave her up to die. She could not turn herself in bed nor even get a hand. Several times the fawn attempted to enter the room where its mistress was, but was as often turned out. One afternoon, the window being open to its full height, the fawn jumped into Eva's bedroom, and remained there, unknown to the rest of the family, all the while lapping and kissing her face with undue devotion and caresses. From that hour Eva began to amend, and finally recovered, and is now living. The fawn immediately sickened and died. Was not here an exchange of magnetic conditions? and is there any other philosophical interpretation to be put upon this fact than that a spirit psychologized the fawn to save Eva?"

SOMEBODY'S HALF-GROWN GIRL.

BY MAGGIE CARROL.

The kettle was bright as a kettle could be,
By Aide, the kitchen maid's every thought,
And Pattie's bare feet beat her heart's jubilee.
Jim had been sent other tithe to win:
And she carried father's dinner.

Ladies were out in their summer array,
Children were buzzing like bees in the sun,
And the shops,—little Patty turned bravely away.
Shops stood still, but minutes would run,
And she carried father's dinner.

Day crept after day, some pleasant, some not—
Each rounded hour with its lot to small;
But the noon-nearing hour, cold or hot,
Stooped and and shoulders above them all,
For Pattie carried the dinner.

The great bell brawled in the upper air;
How slow the workmen were getting out!
Coming at last, though, pale after pair;
But where was the merry song and shout,
Gladdening the way to dinner?

Pattie watched them filing down
The short, black road to the foundry gate;
All but the face so tired and so brown;
What in the world made father late,
When here was the kettle and Pattie?

At sight of these,—the child and the can,—
Why should a white tide wash each face?
Why did they all, to the oldest man,
Seem to whisper a prayer or a grace?
So marveled little Patty.

"His daughter," "His dinner," "Ten minutes 'fore quitting,"—
Into her ears the broken words leapt,
Whilst over the way a crowd interknitting,
And father not come—what horror had crept
Over our waiting Pattie!

You'd better go home, child, father is there."
It thronged the roughest, grimiest of all.
Yet lightas a flower came his hand on her hair,
Pure as a star was the tear he let fall
Over the orphaned Pattie.

Father was there when Pattie went in:
Tired, no longer, nor old, nor brown,
The dimple came back to his shaven chin,
His hands at rest, and folded down.
Labor and striving ended.

Pattie is somebody's "half-grown girl."
With a full-grown woman's work to do;
Somebody's baby begs at the curb
Father's hand used to wander though.
After the dinner was o'er.

Somebody's—yours, my lady so fair!
Or yours, good madame, with screws of steel!
One fingered hunger, one crumb-cumbered with care,
Both forgetting a child can feel,
And who regardeth the poorest.

Somebody's half-grown girl—ah me!
These Patties are legion the wide world through!
If her story hum in your heart, then see—
Is she not in your kitchen toiling for you?
Are you not Pattie's keeper?

There is One who sees, where'er she may be,
Notes every task she is set to do,
Deal with her, then, as tenderly
As you would heaven should deal with you:
Make not the burden too grievous.

For some day the great noon-rest shall come,
And father and child sit together once more;
All eyes shall see in that searching sun
Who heaped offense against Pattie's door,
And God, who has seen, will remember.

The Demands of the Hour.

In an editorial in Windhall and Claflin's Weekly, Oct. 7th, after referring to the false and malignant charges against Spiritualists made by a portion of the press and pulpit, the editor says:

But while all these forces are busily at work endeavoring to shut the eyes of the people against the sight of the spirit-world which is opening to their view, the spirits themselves are just as busy preventing the view, and of the two the latter are getting the most attention. And these irreverent parsons and the malicious press will awake some morning, not far distant, to learn with surprise, if not with dismay, that the armies of Spiritualism with whom they have long been battling, with apparent success, have been re-inforced by the whole spirit-world, organized into solid column and ready to be hurled upon them, to at once and forever destroy their too long continued resistance to the onward march of the world of ideas. The kingdom is already not only conquered but well-developed, and thousands who look into the heavens and see the marshaling hosts are expecting the denouement of the battle, not after death, but now, and may cry insanity, or whatever they please, those who see and know look calmly on, and with a serene happiness contemplate the rapidly approaching crisis.

To these, however, we have a word to say. Are you not almost as criminally negligent as your opponents are willfully obstinate? Are your houses ready? Are they swept and garnered ready to receive your new allies? And are you endeavoring to prepare the way to make their paths straight? Much we fear that your indifference is nearly equal to the sum of opposition, and that it will be so regarded by those who shall come to you. It behooves us all to bestir ourselves and see what is to be done after the glorious consummation shall have come. Those who have been blessed by the comforting assurances which wipe away, alike, all tears and fears, should lay hold of humanity, and teach them the principles of life. Four millions of outspoken men and women, with six millions more standing ready to speak when the time shall come, and these re-inforced by the combined spirit-world, are a power which, when once set in motion, will burst and sweep over the land like a thunderstorm, purifying its elements now loaded with the death and decay of the old civilization.

Then will the prophecies of all ages be verified. Then, in reality, will each and every individual place his faith in an Infinite, Omnipresent, and Omnipotent God—their common Father—and regard all humanity as a common brotherhood, created in God's own image, and bearing alike his seal of divinity and immortality. Then no more shall one set himself above his brother or sister, but all shall acknowledge each as of common and equal origin, and not only entitled to, but possessed of, a common destiny.

These are noble sentiments, and we say amen to them. We have seen that the great work of Spiritualism, notwithstanding the weakness and indifference of many of those who profess to accept its grand truths, has been progressing with unparalleled rapidity.

The spirits, not in the least discouraged at these things, have presented themselves through multitudes of channels, and the people, eager and earnest in their search after a knowledge of these things, have been awakened to the investigation of this subject. The result is an almost universal acceptance of the facts of modern Spiritualism, so that its phenomena are seldom denied by any intelligent persons. The last hold of the churches is the poor and absurd cry of "the devil!" which in former times succeeded in frightening many, but to-day its influence is gone.

We pity those who really think that "Spiritualism is the greatest delusion that has ever come upon the world," because we know they have such an overwhelming consciousness of the fact that Spiritualism is the power of the age, before which all others must bow.

The concluding remarks of the above extract are of the utmost importance to us. We believe that the time has come when there will be a shaking of the dry bones, and unless we are willing to be forced into some more practical work, others will be called and chosen to do it. Long enough have we frittered away our powers in little petty jealousies and suspicions. It is time now that we took hold of the work in earnest.

The question of woman's suffrage and political action among Spiritualists can no longer be kept back. There is no reason why such a mighty power as this should be kept in the hands of our opponents and unused by ourselves. We were among the first to give woman her place on the rostrum; let us not hesitate in putting her upon the platform. Let us then, rally the men and women of Spiritualism to this great work. Half of the ten millions of Spiritualists in this country are women. Their influence and their rights are just as sacred as any other. Let us agitate the question of political action.

Already the right of women to vote under the Constitution of the United States, as now amended, has received the sanction of some of the most distinguished men and women of the land. The steps in the logic are exceedingly short and straight. If women are persons, and persons are citizens, and citizens are entitled to equal rights, and voting is a right, there can be no doubt of the matter with unbiased minds.

To us the course is very plain. Our duty is to do right in every direction. We have read that we should "cease to do evil" that we may "learn to do well." We propose to reverse this and say, learn to do right, and you will cease to do evil.

If good government is essential to the progress and well-being of society, and no one doubts this, then the men and women who are the source from whence all rightful governments, spring, and who, if they do their duty, make it, should not hesitate as to their course. The time has passed for timid councils. The great question of the age is woman's suffrage.

"If we have whispered, let us whisper no longer,
But speak as the tempest does, sterner and stronger."

Women of the land, it is your right and your duty to vote, and vote earnestly and conscientiously, and we know you will not falter where true courage is needed.

In many sections, women are prepared to meet the surging tide of opposition and cast their votes, we were going to say, like men, but we would rather say, like noble and true women. The time is not far distant when men will deny that they ever thought that woman should not participate in the government, and in the coming era, all reforms will have the joint influence of men and women. The temperance and the labor movements which have lagged so long, will have a new impetus given to them. Education, the great lever that is to elevate the world, will be equalized and made free to all, and the fears of the conservative will all be dissipated in the practical realization of the good and the true.

Communication Through the Mediumship of Ray L. P.

We are but as dust and ashes, so soon does this fleeting life pass away. Let us improve every hour of our time, so that when the Master calls, we may be ready with our lamps brightly burning, our armor buckled on, and our staffs in our hands to go forth into the country of our Lord. This world is only a place of preparation, for it is not life that we pass here. The real life only begins when we have passed the dividing line between the better land and this.

Oh! children of earth, hearken to the warning voice of one who wasted his best years in riotous living; who spent the fleeting moments of preparation given to all the sons and daughters of men in foolish indulgence of so-called pleasure; who wasted time, talents, energies, and all the divine gifts of a kind and loving Father, in sloth and dissipation, hiding his talents in a napkin and foolishly saying, "There is no God." Alas! too late I learned the solemn and to me awful fact that there was not only a God, but a judge. But how blessed to sinful souls is the knowledge that the judge is full of mercy and loving kindness, and ever listens to the cry of His erring children.—"Father, forgive us, for we know not what we do."

I am a stranger to you, but I was drawn where you were last evening by the mournful tones of a musical voice singing the wail of a soul erroneously called lost. I saw that you were one of the new order of teachers of the divine religion that teaches mercy and love for all souls, and I thought I would try and impress you with a few thoughts that would be of use to you in your mission of love, and thus redeem some of my lost opportunities. I saw minds there last night into which this new light had not entered, which were in just such darkness as the lost soul. Oh! teacher of this new philosophy, how could you sit by and know it and not raise your voice to dispell the error? You are just as much to blame in thus neglecting these opportunities as I was when I raised the wine cup to my lips, or joined in the sinful midnight revel, and God will judge you accordingly. Oh! child, let me entreat you not to be silent when you ought to speak or sit down with folded hands, while error stalks abroad, holding souls in bondage.

Work while it is yet day, for the night cometh, when no one can work. Heed my warning voice, and by so doing you will help me, and all others like me who are seeking for light.

GEO. WALKER.

Passed to Spirit Life.

From Landgrove, Vt., Oct. 4th, 1871, Lydia Ann, wife of Page Warner, in the 31st year of her age. She leaves a companion a fair daughter of nine summers, father, mother, sister and brothers, to mourn her sudden departure. 'Twas hard to lay away the beautiful form, and the many tears shed by sympathizing friends testified to her spiritual worth. May the kind ministrations of her spirit be near and comfort all, is the prayer of the writer.

From South Londonderry, Vt., Oct. 7th, Reuben Harrington, aged 76 years. He was one of the first settlers in the town. He leaves a wife and eight children, seven of whom were present at his funeral. It was never my privilege to make the acquaintance of a more harmonious family, and this is the first link in the golden chain that has been withdrawn.

From Andover, Vt., Oct. 8th, Mrs. R. B. Stickney, in the 53d year of her earth-life. She lived in deeds, not years. For a long period she had suffered much, but possessing a strong will, and being a healing medium, she was able, most of the time, to attend to her household duties. Not alone will her companion and children miss her, but a large circle of friends mourn the loss of a true woman.

From Antrum, N. H., Oct. 10th, Abby M., aged 10 years, daughter of the late Cynthia Robb. Truly the father is afflicted. In less than four months he has laid away the forms of a loving wife and two daughters. On previous occasions he sought consolation from the clergy, but found it not, and now he cried, "Give me truth," and he listened for the first time to the inspiration as it is given from the angels. On that dreary morn, ere we laid the beautiful bud by the side of the dear ones, how pleasant the thought that she went not alone; that mother and sister welcomed her. May they bless, comfort, and guide the dear sister, brother, and lone father is my prayer.

BY THEODORE TILTON.

This little pamphlet is a brief sketch of the life of Victoria Claflin Woodhull, "a young woman," in the world of the author, "whose career has been as singular as any heroine's in a romance; whose ability is of a rare and high character; whose personal appearance, contrast with the whiteness of her life; whose position as a representative of her sex, in the greatest reform of modern times, renders her an object of peculiar interest to her fellow citizens; and whose character (inasmuch as I know her well) I can portray without color or tinge from any other partiality save that I hold her in uncommon respect."

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric, and Business Medium.

148 Fourth Ave., Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms, and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will with most certainty be drawn a more patient prescription and etc. for eradicating the disease, and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought en rapport with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the positive and negative forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. Robinson also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the disease of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controlling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business, and trance medium.

TERMS:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $3.00; each subsequent one, $2.00. Psychometric Delineation of character, $3.00. Answering Business Letters, $5.00. The money should accompany the application to insure a reply.

SEALED LETTERS ANSWERED BY R. W. FLINT, 31 Clinton Place, New York. Terms $2.00 and three stamps. Money refunded when not answered.

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.

By D. W. Hull.

"A theocracy, up to a certain point, is educative; beyond that point it is obstructive."—S. Barring Gould.

The history of the world is written in Theocratic Government. And as often as people have tried them they have found them useful only in increasing the power of those in authority, and enslaving the opposite class.

Any effort toward a theocratic government can only result in depriving the masses of their liberties, and establishing a dangerous aristocracy, whose only aim will be, to arrest the development of the human race. The reason of this is, people who engraft a Deity of any kind in their national charter are driven to the necessity of making such descriptions of Him as will distinguish him from any other being, or Infinite personage.

All descriptions of Deity are incarnated ideas, or ideas of an incarnate Deity; for language can describe nothing more. Hence there is no difference, so far as the principle is concerned, whether I carve out the mental picture I have formed of God in a piece of marble, and require men to fall down and worship, as they did Nebuchadnezzar's image, or whether I describe my Deity so as to form a mental picture in the minds of my auditors, and require divine homage paid to that; either one is idolatry. The artist may take my description of Deity and carve out an image, representing the ideas I wish to convey, and if he has instituted idolatry, it is because I have given him the outlines.

The very moment we undertake to legislate upon the subject of God, we are legislating upon the opinions of people, and we are insisting that the law shall enforce people to recognize our ideas of God, instead of that of other people, whose ideas may be as orthodox as our own.

All descriptions of God are necessarily finite, and hence come far short of the Infinite. An attempted finite description of the Infinite is no description at all, since it must utterly fall short of reaching the outer extent of one of his attributes. To illustrate: I believe God is infinitely good, but my ideas of infinite goodness are circumscribed by the breadth of my mental horizon, and are of course far short of infinity. But my neighbor may have a wider or narrower range of infinity in that direction than I have, and his ideas of infinite goodness would differ correspondingly. If he should become a lawmaker of the land, and felt it his duty to legislate upon the subject he would be in great danger of making me a hypocrite, or of inducing me to bear penalties, and all because I may have believed too much or too little. The Universalist worships a God of universal love, benevolence and goodness, whilst the Methodist would subordinate the love of God to His justice, and either one could not legislate upon the subject without seriously injuring the ideas of his friend. In this way we might reason on all his attributes, and when we had described them we should find that we had only incarnated our ideas into a being who was but little better than ourselves, and we should ultimately discover that we had legislated ourselves into Atheism; for as we should develop to have broader views of the material and spiritual universe we should find that we had deprived ourselves of the privilege of believing them, and an ignorant class would ever hold us under the ban of the laws we had made. We should then find out that that which we had described as God, was only a finite idol, and that to believe in that was to believe in no God at all. Says a recent writer, speaking on the subject,

> The idea of infinity which rejects every limitation, leads to the denial of attributes to God. For, if His intelligence be infinite, He does not pass from one idea to another, but knows all perfectly and instantaneously; to Him the past, the present and the future are not; therefore He can neither remember nor foresee. He can neither generalize nor analyze; for, if He were to do so, there would be some detail in things, the conception of which would be wanting to Him. He can not reason, for reason is the passage from two terms to a third; and He has no need of a middle term to perceive the relation of a principle to its consequence. He can not think, for to think is to allow of succession to ideas.

He is therefore immutable in His essence; in Him are neither thoughts, feelings, nor will. Indeed, it is an abuse of words to speak of being, feeling, willing, in connection with God, for these words have a sense limited to finite ideas, and are therefore inadmissable when treating of the Absolute.

The vulgar idea of God is not one that the reason can admit. He is neither infinite nor absolute, necessary, universal nor perfect."

He is not infinite, for God is infinite only on condition of being all. But a God meeting His limitation in nature, the world and humanity is not all. Also, if He be a person, He will be a being, and not merely Being.

He is not absolute, for how can He be conceived apart from His relations; if He be a person, He feels, thinks, wishes, and here we have relations, conditions imposed on the Absolute, and He ceases to be absolute.

He is not necessary; the idea representing Him as necessary is the result of a psychological induction; but induction can not confer on the ideas it discovers the character of necessity.

He is not universal, for an Individual, however great, extended, powerful and perfect, can not be universal. What is individual is particular, and the particular can not be All.

He is not perfect; for how can he be perfect to whom the universe is added; it was necessary or it was not necessary; if necessary He was imperfect without it; if not necessary He is imperfect with it.

As an instance to show that our future possible ideas of God may be far in advance of what they are at present, let us look at the growth in that direction as chronicled in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. In the beginning Moses recognizes no separate Deity working single-handed; for there were several of them who were ever ready to log-roll for each other. Instance following:

> And the Lord said, Let us make man.—Gen. i. 26.
>
> And the Lord said, Behold, man has become as one of us.—Gen. iii. 22.
> Go to, let us go down and there confound their language.—Gen. xi. 7.

This was their idea of the Deities of the universe, in those days, but, in a little time we find them changing somewhat, at least, so that each nation had its separate Deity. And they had their laws restricting the belief on this Divine Being in some such way as to hold persons to their way of thinking. These laws were of the most rigid type, compelling people to stone their brothers, sons, daughters, or wives to death if they believed different from Moses' description of God; or as the language has it, in "other gods," with perhaps higher attributes than the one Moses had described to them. (Deut. xiii: 6, 10.)

Moses's God, or the Jehovah-God, was of such a low type that if we were to put that law in force we should be compelled to stone to death every adult person in Christendom; for there are none but will admit that it would be impossible for Moses to give the Infinite a new idea. Yet Moses did reason with the Jehovah God, and convincing him of his error, changed his purpose. (See Ex. xxxii: 9—14. Num. xiv: 13—21.) We could none of us be made to believe that the Infinite God, was afraid to risk himself with a people, knowing himself to be passionate, and fearing that he may become so enraged as to do something that he should ever after be sorry for—kill all the people. (Ex. xxxiii: 3—5.) Yet people once had a law compelling subjects to accept just such ideas of God, and this Being, as just described, was petted into a good humor by giving him a harem containing thirty-two young women, where he might gratify his lusts. (Num. xxxi: 40.)

Jesus came and taught a different idea of God from that taught in their oracles, and all the prejudice resulting from opposition to innovations was brought to bear against His ideas of God. God could not be a spirit; for Moses had talked with him face to face; he had come down to find out whether the report that had come to him of the Tower of Babel was a truth, or whether it was just a report started by the devil to harrass and tease the everlasting life out of the Almighty, and he had been worshipped on the mountains, which would have been unnecessary if he had been a spirit. Besides, the descriptions given of him were really the descriptions of another God, and as the prophecies had threatened them with destruction as a nation if they served other gods, they feared that if all men were to believe on him the Romans would come and take away their place and nation. And we might add that although we are far in advance of the Hebrew idea of God, we are not yet developed to the true Christian idea of God. To illustrate,—the Hebrew God was so holy that he could not admit any one with a personal defect, or blemish, into his congregation, and every person who had the misfortune to be in any way deformed, or sexually imperfect, was consigned to damnation, if, indeed, the Hebrew had any words answering to punishment after the life of in the present stage of the church we are inclined to look with more charity toward unfortunate people, and our ideas of God have correspondingly improved, but yet we can have no pity on those who have such defective organizations as to make them spiritually defective, while Jesus says, He "came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance;" and he was ever ready to lend a helping hand to the poor, sinning magdalenes and forgive the crimes of the poor adulterer, who was about to be stoned to death, in accordance with the riggorous Hebrew law. What a sad plight we had now been in, if the constitution then enforced had continued down to this time.

There is another thought connected with this; and that is the authority we shall appeal to in describing this God. If the Old Testament, we shall recount the scenes of an old, barbarous age of the world, which would convert our beautiful earth into a pandemonium. War, murder and rapine will run rife, and a saint of God will canonize sins as virtues. We shall pass down to the fourth, fifth and sixth centuries, and quarrel those old, obsolete ideas of God over again. And this we must do at any rate, if we undertake to engraft a God in our constitution.

I believed the originators of that idea wished to have God recognized in the constitution, and Jesus Christ as His son. I am not going to argue at any great length upon the Sonship of Christ. I believe I have done that elsewhere. But really, (and I am candid while I refer to it,) would it not be just as well, while we are at it, to add another clause recognizing Satan as his adversary? From a boy I could not help thinking there was as much a quadrenity in the Godhead as a trinity. Satan was a doubtful character, who at one time was a friend of the Almighty, helping him to kill Jesus for our salvation, smoking sinners out of hell into heaven just to please God, or becoming His executioner to all upon whom God passes the sentence of damnation, and carries him a step in deception to help the Lord in deluding the world into the jaws of an unending death, (see 2d Thess. ii. 9—11,) and at another time he seems to be the Royal Arch Foe of God, defeating Him in all his benevolent purposes, dragging down to destruction the very ones the Lord was trying to save, reducing God to the absolute necessity of becoming at once his own Father and his own Son, and giving up his everlasting life, which he never could lose, and this too in an abortive effort to save the world. Indeed, I have always thought it hard work for the theological world to get along without the devil; but it was infinitely harder to get along with him. If the perfections of God consisted in infinite goodness, and the attribute of the devil infinite wickedness, it should be half inclined to change my mind and think we had exalted the wrong one. The theological world is too apt to let all these antinomies pass without an explanation. Honesty would require that they should state just how much of these contrary theories they believe or discard—Bibles to the contrary notwithstanding.

If Jesus is the Son of God then he is not the Father-God, else he should be his own father. If he is the Father-God, then Cassien is right when he says he is the father of Mary, and therefore the father of his own mother, and as this would make him his own grandfather, we should get such a mixture in the relations of the God-head, that we should be in danger of becoming insane, in trying to solve the problem, if we should do not entirely throw up the idea of God having any relations. To ask us to subscribe to a law recognizing such a relationship in the trinity, is to insult the good sense of every freeman in America.

If it stopped here we might sadly lay our reason on the executioner's block, and agree never to make use of our five senses, but when we are told that God made a law against adultery, and then was reduced to the necessity of becoming the father of an illegitimate child, thus subjecting himself to the same damnation from which he is striving to save us, and that he so exhausted himself in that one effort as to become that very illegitimate child, of which he was the father, our Infidelity gets the mastery of us, and the very scheme of salvation becomes an instrument of damnation to us, so we cannot believe if we would.

Our conceptions of Deity are somewhat molded by tradition, and whilst we may be correct on some points, we may not be entirely free from the superstitions of those who have handed us the tradition. Indeed, the very spirit that would force a belief in a Deity upon us partakes more or less of the barbarity of the originators of those ancient ideas of God.

I have elsewhere traced out to a considerable extent the origin of Gods, but I may yet presume to touch upon that subject without fear of exhausting it. In those papers I have traced these Gods back to their astrological origin, and although I find I am at issue with many learned writers on this part of the subject, I am more and more convinced that all our conceptions of Deity originated in the apparent life and intelligence of the heavenly bodies. Below I will give some definitions to names popularly attributed to the Deity, taken with little change from S. Barring Gould's work, "The Origin and Progress of Religion, a learned work which should be in the hands of every one. These definitions are claimed to be attributes of the sun, yet they have come down to us as so many separate deities:

DELIOS—Brilliant, (and here we find the grand root for our deity in the word De.)

PHOIBOS—(from which Phœbus) Darting.

PILSTON—Burning.

UPERION—Upper, Lofty, Most High.

DOXIOS—Oblique Course.

APOLLYON—(from which Apollo,) Putting darkness to flight.

HERAKLES, or HERCULES—Glory of the Air.

MEMNON—Constant in its course; unchanging.

HEPHALOS—Head of the Planetary System; Golden Faced.

KUNAR—Golden Rayed.

ENDYMION—Shepherd leading the flock to pasture.

The same author tells us in the Vedas the sun is called:

SURYA—Brilliant.

MITHRA—The Friend.

ARYAMAN—Generous.

BHAGA—Beneficent.

PUSHON—Nourisher.

IVOSHTRE—Creator.

DIVASPATE—Lord of Heaven.

In addition to the above we find other attributes as follows:

BRAHMA EL—Strength.

DIN, DENA—Splendor.

GOD—Good.

MOLOCH, MILCAH—King.

BEL, BAAL—The Lord.

RIMON, RAM—Exalted One.

These names, once the attributes of the sun, came in time to mean the God of the Universe, and all through the Hebrew Scriptures we find the Jehovah God invested with the same attributes. Take, for instance, the words Delios and Surya, terms used to express brightness, and we find the same allusions made to the Hebrew Deity in the following Scriptures:

> And I saw as the colore of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it from the appearance of his loins even upward, and from the appearance of his loins even downward, I saw a fire and the appearance of fire, and it had brightness round about.—Ezek. i: 27.
> Then I beheld, and lo a likeness as the appearance of fire: from the appearance of his loins even downward, fire; and from his loins even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the color of amber.—Ezek. viii, 2.
>
> And the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory.—Ezek. x: 4.
> God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran. Selah. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. And his brightness was as the light; he had horns coming out of his hand; and there was the hiding of his power.—Heb. iii: 4.
> Who bring in the brightness of his glory.—Heb. i: 3.
> And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.—2 Thess. ii: 8.

All those terms referring to the glory of God can mean nothing less or more than the brightness of the sun.

Another word, darting, shows the sun, like Apollo, sends forth his darts. That the Jewish God was similarly armed with a bow and quiver, let the following Scriptures testify:

> For the arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit; the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me.—Job vi: 4.
> For thine arrows stick fast in me, and thy hand presseth me sore.—Psa. xxxviii: 2.

In Psalms, xci: 5, we learn that this arrow flies by day-time—a very proper time for the sun to send forth his darting rays.

The other attributes, such as "Burning," "Most High," "Putting darkness to flight," "Shepherd," "Generous," "Beneficent," "Nourisher," "Creator," "Lord of Heaven," etc., are each the attributes of the Jewish God as may be found and proven by consulting the following Scriptures: Gen. xiv: 18; Isa. lii: 2; Psa. xcvii: 3; Is. xxvii: 4; Matt. iv: 1; Luke iii: 17; Deut. ix: 15; 2 Pet. iii: 10: the last quotation having evident reference to Phæton, who is to drive the chariot of the sun so close to earth one of these days as to set the world on fire. Psa. xcvii: 9, cxxxviii: 6; Num. xxiv: 16; Deut. xxxii: 8; 2 Sam. xxii: 14; Psa. vii: 7, lxi: 7, xvi: 7, xviii: 13; Luke i: 35, vi: 35: Psa xviii: 9, xxx: 5, xcvii: 4; cxix: 105, xxiii: 1, etc., etc.

Mr. Cox says:

> Thus the ancients spoke of everything as if it were alive, and instead of saying, as we say, that the morning comes before the sunset, they spoke of the sun as the lover of the dawn or morning, who went before him as longing to overtake her, and as killing her with his bright rays, which shone like spears. We talk of the clouds which send along the sky; but they spoke of the cows of the sun, which the children of the morning drove every day to their pastures in the blue fields of heaven. So, too, when the sun set, they said that the dawn with its soft and tender light, had come to soothe her son or her husband in his dying hour. In the same way, the sun was the child of darkness, and in the morning he wove for his bride in the heavens a fairy net-work of clouds which reappeared when she came back to him in the evening.—P. 11. See "Chips from a German Work Shop." By Max Muller.

Mr. S. B. Gould says:

> The spectacles of nature now became a stately drama in which all the actors were divine. The sun was supposed to be a warrior, clad in golden panoply, the moon to be a queen, the stars to be armies of heroes or spirits; the trees moved of their own accord, the tides were the pulsation of the living heart-ocean.—Origin and Development of Religious Belief, p. 146.

Legislation upon the subject destroys the idea of an infinite God; and the very fact of our protecting Him by legislation proves our want of faith in His infinity.

1. If He is infinite, he is omnipotent, and is therefore able to take care of himself; and is superior to all legislation. The design of all legislation is assist the weak in resisting the encroachments of those who are more powerful. A body or settlement of men and women organize for mutual protection, and agree upon certain rules which they will not violate and which they will assist each other in maintaining. To legislate upon the subject of recognizing God is to suppose that He is a helpless creature, and appeals for a common interest with us. It also supposes He may violate one or several of these rules and may be liable to the penalties attached to such violation. I cannot for the life of me see any infinity in a being who derives his power from the law.

2. He would also be omniscient, and being all-powerful, He could tell us Himself just what kind of a law He would like to have. Indeed, He would, if He could debate the subject with those who are not favorable to such a scheme, and give His reasons therefor, which, if He was infinitely good, He would do, rather than have us remain in ignorance of our duty.

3. Such a movement on His part, however, would destroy our faith in Him, from the fact that we are not able to comprehend Him as the author of our organisms, and at the same time demanding a law at variance with the ideas He has arranged our organism to receive. If He demanded a legal recognition, my organism would have been capacious enough to have contained that idea—to argue otherwise is to deny that He is the author of my organism.

4. It supposes that He has been imposed upon heretofore, and badly oppressed, and that we should never have ceased this oppression had it not been for the agitation of the subject of "God's Rights."

The difficulty after all is, men are beginning to think, and all this imposition on us "in the name of the Lord" is resented "in the name of humanity." Religion in Deity are obsolete, and men are losing sight of one superstition after another, until we no longer recognize the churchal deity. In addition to the points in the characteristics of Deity which I have mentioned as in the past, I might refer to a few more. To illustrate:

We once believed in a devil with horns and hoofs, whose business it was to harrass and seduce every son and daughter of humanity, for no other object only that he might have the pleasure of seeing them "fry." Now we are wont to laugh at the minister who refers to Him (give Him a capital H here) as any other than a fabled scarecrow of bygone days. We then believe in the Atonement in which spiritual Bankrupts might obtain a right to all the privileges and immunities of the upper world; as if they had earned every gold cobble stone with which its streets are said to be paved. We are now beginning to learn that it is not so much what a man believes and thinks as what he does that acquits or condemns him. Heaven is only open to those who earn it.

We talked to God once as if we supposed Him an easy subject of flattery, and gave him our views on subjects in general. Some of us do it no longer. If I can move the arm of God by prayer, then am I master of the universe, and God is only my servant, doing my business, and receiving compensation in a certain amount of currency or flattery, which may to Him be an equivalent. We read that the prayer of faith shall remove mountains and sycamore trees, and

> All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer believing, ye shall receive.—Matt. xvii: 20, xxi: 21, Luke xvii; 6.

Which, if true, would make out God nothing more than a little puppet, shaping himself to suit the caprices of each individual. The man who would pray for God to remove a mountain or a sycamore tree, shows to Him that he has discovered some defect in His works, and which he knows just how to remedy, but wants to instruct his God in the matter, so God is only his big ox, hauling obstacles out of the way for man's convenience. He also supposes God to be indebted to him for the discovery of this defect, or he supposes that God would alter His works just to please his notions of things. If he is Almighty, there is no use in telling Him what ought to be done. He knew it, and our telling Him will not change His notions; hence all prayer is lifeless formality. To illustrate this let me quote a common form of prayer, and iterlard in brackets some explanations.

> "O Lord our Heavenly Father, Thou who dwellest in heaven, [flattery] Thou art the creator and preserver of all things; [flattery] we thank Thee that we live and move and have our being; [Imagine a response of, "You are quite welcome, I am sure,"] that we are neither dead nor damned—for hadst Thou visited one sin in a thousand, we should be beyond the reach of hope and mercy. [He's not just, or He would have done it.] Thousands of our fellow mortals, as good by nature as we, and far better by practice, are now reaping the unalterable laws of an unending eternity. [Not a very good comment on His justice.] Yet we have [by His partiality] still another opportunity to make our calling and election sure. We come before Thee, O Lord, to ask the forgiveness of our sins. [Must have indulgence.] O Lord, look in mercy on us and remember us in Thy love. [We pray Thee that Thou wouldst prosper Thy cause. [He hadn't thought of that for sometime before.] O send more laborers into the harvest, for the harvest is great and the laborers are few, [another piece of information]. O, Lord, hasten the time when all shall know Thee from the least unto the greatest [We are satisfied that you are not diligent enough in this matter, and we want you to hurry up.] O Lord check the progress of evil [we ought to know enough to do it without being told,] and promote the cause of truth, [which you would do, if you were as much interested in the matter as we are.] O Lord hear our prayer [Do pay attention and don't forget in an hour, like a stupid dolt, what we have been telling you,] and answer our petitions. And in the end when we are called to die, and Thou, [which, on account of our unworthiness, you may not do, or on account of your forgetfulness you may neglect and leave us the subject of one of the devil's infernal jokes,] and the praise, and the honor, and the glory, we will ascribe through endless ages to Thee. If a great consideration which will certainly be the same inducement to you to save,—only just think what an advantage such an arrangement will be to you.] All of which we ask for Jesus' sake [rather thin—but the Almighty may bite.] Amen. [I am done now, and you will have to wait an hour or two before you have the privilege of hearing me again.] Heaven save the Almighty from many such prayers; but I submit, if I have overstated the matter.

But a word about faith—mustard seed faith—where one mustard seed will outweigh a whole mountain if it is dealt out in the way of faith—where is that kind of faith in these days? What has it? Yet "without faith it is impossible to please God." (Heb. xi: 6.) No difference how little may be wanting to place you on speaking-terms, if you have not the mustard seed faith you can't get near him. No use to ask: "O Lord increase our faith;" for unless you back your petition with faith, you will only make him more angry with you; for "whatsoever is not of faith, is sin;" [Rom. xiv: 23,] and "God cannot look upon sin with the least degree of allowance." Be careful when you pray, for if you increase the distance between you and God the more praying you do, the more you will be off. Tried by this standard, very few of us are very sure of salvation; for most of us have been guilty of sending up petitions which have never been answered. The fault is in our want of faith, for only one grain small as a mustard seed would have brought us all we asked, even to the dividing of the kingdom of heaven between ourselves and the Almighty. The blood washed Christian, look over your petitions and see how many of them have been answered! and if you find one delinquency known that you are a sinner before God and unless you have faith, don't you attempt to ask God to blot it out of His book; for you will only aggravate the crime and make your sins more than they were.

And should you be a wicked, unregenerate man or woman, don't you attempt to try to make terms with God; for "the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord;" (Prov. xv: 8,) and we cannot expect to have faith in one who loathes our prayer. The wicked man can never be anything else for he does not pray without incurring the displeasure of God, and He cannot without committing a greater sin, and as to the article of faith, every circumstance forbids the use of it.

A few words now on the tendency of this movement, and then I have done. A God recognized in the Constitution supposes that some one may not believe in Him. But all men believe in some kind of a principle which they call God; but all are not agreed in the description of his attributes. The bigot expects every one to believe just as he does, and he is ready to denounce all as Atheists who do not. In His view, the Constitution would disfranchise such a person, if thus amended. The result would be either legislative act or a judicial decision describing His attributes. Then it would become necessary for each individual to become connected with some church in order to be recognized as a citizen, and thus we should have church and State firmly united, with a proud, corrupt priesthood at the head of all governmental affairs. All the investigations of science will be limited within a prescribed range, and no truth will be accepted not in harmony with our law-established religion. Few indeed of the wise men of our day would favor any such a movement when it is known that all except bigots are deprived of certain privileges, then it will be found that both the law-making and the law-executing power is all in their hands. The termination of the whole affair will be that one class of citizens will rebel and the other will become a set of dastardly hypocrites believing one thing and professing another.

An inquisition will be established, in which to avoid suspicion people will betray their dearest friends.

The church has ruled too long already and the very fact that they are conniving for power again should deprive them of the privileges they enjoy. They that strike for our liberties are dangerous men in society, and the tighter they are bound, the better it will be for humanity. Look at the past history of the church. See what crimes have been committed in the name of religion.

Moses butchers his thousands because his God tells him to. He is followed by Joshua who remembered too well the example set by his predecessor. Saul goes out under the command of God (through the mediumship of Samuel) and kills off all the Amalekites except Agag their king, but Samuel hearing of it became very much offended with Saul and hews Agag to pieces before the Lord. David in the name of the Lord gathers up a band of ruffians who had ran away from debt, and who have become dissatisfied on account of the disposition of the government to interfere with their liberties in appropriating whatever of their neighbors' goods they wished,—and, hiding in the mountains, come out once in awhile to obtain whatever plunder he might get. Such theological piracy would now meet with a sad termination.

Constantine kills thousands in the name of religion.

Theodosius and Justin-kill more.

Peter the Hermit, sacrifices nearly one hundred thousand lives in trying to carry on the war of the Crusades.

The Catholic Inquisition slew between fifty and seventy-five millions of people, all in support of an idea.

Experience teaches us it is never safe to entrust our liberties with a set of religious enthusiasts. Let them enjoy their religion, but make such barriers in the way that they cannot overleap their just rights and encroach upon the rights of others. Hold them within the same limits we would a Chinaman or a Hindoo, and we are safe. Give not one step if you would not yield more. One concession demands another. Here all are equal but none are superior.

The design of government is mutual protection, and whatever tends to build up an aristocracy is subversive of the liberty for which our fathers bled. God needs no help from us. We can do him no good if we should try, and if he is abused, he is able to take his own part without calling on his "big brothers" to help him. The very fact that we are legislating on the subject shows our lack of faith in His divine power. We should not want to help him unless we thought he would suffer in a controversy without our assistence. If we were certain there was evidence of his existence, we should not want a legislative enactment to make men believe that which there is a want of evidence of. But it is not a God that men want a faith in; but individual interpretations of God, which men cannot accept.

Wm. B. Fahnestock to H. T. Child.

Upon my return home from Mariotta I found the usual number of papers here from you—for which many thanks.

In your fifth article on "Healing Mediumship," you state, and very truly, that "the statuvolist is very sensitive, not only to certain weak points" referred to, "but to the influence of those around them; they also feel that every person affects them either pleasantly or otherwise, and are ever able to judge correctly in regard to them." This is an important fact; and if mediums really understood their powers, they would know that their feeling these influences or not was optional with them. Their feeling them being the result of the reaching-out of their own faculties, often, indeed, independent of their consciousness; but still, their feeling them or not, is under the control of their will, consequently it is always in their power to avoid those which are unpleasant, whether they are the result of fright, spasms, perakious influences of any kind.

Some mediums are almost always in an unconscious state of statuvolence, even when their eyes are open, and it is such mediums who are so exquisitively sensitive, and so often suffer from external influences, simply because they are more or less in the statuvolic condition. All suffering, therefore, from such causes is their own fault—or rather the fault of their not knowing the true nature of their condition. Such suffering could always be avoided by throwing themselves out of the condition, which, with proper effort on their part would always enable them to accomplish. Your remarks upon the culture of the will, and the practice of the statuvolic art are excellent and ought to be studied by all who desire to avoid the ills that ignorance is heir to.

All involuntary motions or starting and twitching in mediums, could be avoided by throwing the part or parts so affected into the statuvolic condition. It is only because mediums do not know the true nature of their condition that these involuntary twitchings occur. Let them prevent the body from going into the state and no twitching will take place. I have noticed these involuntary motions in hundreds who have never been controlled by spirits, and almost all who are in a statuvolic condition do so when they cast their mind from one place to another. Many, indeed, do so upon every mental effort.

Your remarks upon the history of medicine, charms, amulets and patent medicines, etc., are true to the very letter; and I agree perfectly with Magdalen in his remarks, that faith has more to do in effecting cures than medicines; and as the mind is properly directed or not, especially when the person is in a statuvolic condition will the results be favorable or otherwise.

The idea, therefore, that there is a power outside of the will of the subject, I am satisfied cannot be demonstrated, and the laying-on of hands like the systems of medicine, will only be successful in proportion to the confidence the act can inspire.

From what you have lately experienced you cannot rank or class yourself with those who believe that they have power over any one, or who would be confounded because intelligence is required before it can be imparted.

Many things look like gold that are far from possessing its qualities; so magnetism and the laying-on of hands may seem to effect cures, when all is in the mind of the subject who receives the work. But the world will progress, ignorance to the contrary, notwithstanding.

Looking Beyond.

BY. J. O. BARRETT.

Life, Soul, Spirit Celestial Body.

A most beautiful book, written in the author's usual finished style, afloat with spiritual illuminations and affections. It contains the testimony of the departed respecting what they see and hear of the "better land;" the philosophy of life, the moral ratio of worlds, the brighter views of the transition called death, the true uses of funerals on a more attractive scale, and visions of the "Beyond." It is a casket of sweet immortelles, and a Bethlehem star in every bereft home.

A

BY

ROBERT DALE OWEN.

—:o:—

The Debatable Land

BETWEEN THIS WORLD AND THE NEXT.

By Robert Dale Owen. Author of "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," etc.

CONTENTS:

Preparatory Address to the Protestant Clergy.

Book I. Touching communication of religious knowledge to man.

Book II. Some characteristics of the Phenomena.

Book III. Physical manifestations.

Book IV. Identity of Spirits.

Book V. The Crowning Proof of Immortality.

Book VI. Spiritual gifts of the first century appearing in our times.

—:o:—

The scope of this book is broad. One-fourth of it is occupied by an Address to the Protestant Clergy, reviewing the present attitude of the religious world in connection with modern science and with modern ideas, touching the relics of Jesus, human infallibility, pleasant inspiration, miracle, spiritual gifts. It sets forth the successes and reverses of early Protestantism and asks their explanation. It enquires whether it is Protestant theology or Christianity that has been losing ground, for three hundred years, against the Church of Rome. It discusses the effects on human and civilization and spiritual growth of such doctrines as Vicarious Atonement, Original Depravity, a Personal Devil, an Eternal Hell. It enquires whether religion is a progressive science. It contains Lutheranism, Paulism, with Christianity. Inspiration it regards as not infallible; yet an inestimable gift of God and the origin of all religions—a gift for all ages, not confined to one century nor to one church; a gift pre-eminently appearing in the Author of our religion.

But the main aim of the book is to afford conclusive proof, aside from historical evidence, of immortality. It shows that we of to-day have the same evidence on that subject as the Apostles had. More than half the volume consists of narratives in proof of this—narratives that will seem marvellous—incredible, at first sight, to many—yet which are sustained by evidence as strong as that which daily determines, in our courts of law, the life and death of men.

This book affirms that the strongest of all historical evidences for Modern Spiritualism are found in the Gospels, and that the strongest of all proof going to substantiate the Gospel narratives are found in the phenomena of Spiritualism, rationally interpreted: Christianity, freed from alien creeds, sustaining Spiritualism; and enlightened Spiritualism sustaining Christianity.

Finally, the author gives his conception of the foundation-motive of Christian morality and spiritual progress, as set forth by Christ himself.

It is a book eminently suited to an era like the present, when the Debatable Land of morals and religion is freely explored, and when men are disposed to prove all things ere they hold fast to that which is good.

A large, handsome volume, beautifully printed and bound.

Price, $2,00; postage free.

BY ..... E. V. WILSON.

An Appeal to my Friends.

Brothers and sisters, the fire-god and wind-god formed a co-partnership, and burned to death the physical bodies of my sister-in-law; Mrs. Matilda Eames, and her only son, Lucien, and one of her daughters, at Birch Creek Settlement, Menominee Co., Mich., on the night of the 9th of October last; also burned the body and face of her husband to such an extent that he will not be able to help himself for many months. There are two little girls left houseless, homeless, penniless,—all gone, not a garment to wear, and there are several thousand others at Menominee, Peshtigo, and Oconto, Wisconsin and Michigan, in the same condition. I have ordered a house furnished, and provisions for the winter, with all necessary to make one of the families comfortable. I have supported two orphans for the last year. The addition of this family to mine make a heavy burden for me to carry, together with other charities I wish to confer. I am not rich; I am not a beggar; I am poor; I am a worker. I have friends and enemies. I am no man's or woman's enemy.

The girls are fifteen and twelve years old respectively. It would be hard to separate them from their father in this, his hour of trial and their sorrow. I should want my children with me, if I were in Mr. Eames' place, and I believe in doing unto others as I would that others should do unto me; hence my course in regard to him. He is not a Spiritualist, but he is a man and a brother. Will any of my friends donate him and his two daughters clothing of any kind, or money. We do not want provision. We have enough of that. Send by express, prepaid, to L ombard, Du Page Co., Ill., care of Mrs. Mary Ellen Wilson. We shall have them with us at Lombard by the time this reaches your eyes,—having already ordered their removal.

I will thankfully receive from my friends such donations as they feel warranted in giving me where I am lecturing.

Brothers and sisters, if ever I was under the direction of angels to do an act of charity, or give a communication from spirit-life, I am now. Do you believe me?

Sarah Somers, of McHenry Co., Ill.; Hannah Gould, of Beaver Dam, Wis., and Prof. J. E. Hendricks, of Des Moines, Iowa, have each donated five dollars. D. S. Michler, Des Moines, Iowa, one dollar.

This act to Mr. Eames will cost me at least three hundred dollars before he is able to help himself, if he ever is.

Let us help each other.

.. Our Second Visit to Minnesota

Saturday, Sept. 2nd, we find ourself comfortably settled in the pleasant and happy home of Brother Donelly, a Spiritualist indeed, surrounded with all earthly comforts, a bountiful almoner in our cause. Brother Donelly stands not alone in Spiritualism in this city.

Lake City is one of the prettiest towns in Minnesota,—the largest town on Lake Pepin, and contains two thousand six hundred and eight inhabitants; a favorite resort for tourists and pleasure seekers,—situated about midway, and on the West shore of Lake Pepin. It is one of the most active and enterprising towns on the Upper Mississippi, and contains in all, over one hundred business houses. We lectured here four times and held two seances, during Saturday, Sunday and Monday, the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th of September. Brother Jamieson has held two or three discussions here, and lectured several times, doing much good, and would do more if he would drop his lecture on dark circles and physical mediums. It is difficult to have people believe us in our manifestations when we condemn others.

Brother Jamieson is a good worker, and I fully believe in his influences,—so do I in Mrs. Ferris, the Davenports, Read and Bastian; but how shall we believe Brother Jamieson when under "Big Indian" influence, he whoops, runs over the prairie in the night, or sleeps on a sheep skin for a bearskin, and then condemns all other physical mediums?

We gave many fine tests in Lake City, one of which we will relate in brief. To a lady and gentleman we said—to the lady first:

"Madam, we see you at sixteen years of age, standing at the forks of a road, between two conflicting elements. You leave the right hand, and take the left hand road. For six years there is joy, happiness and peace. Then comes confusion and shipwreck. At twenty-five years of age, there is another and great change, influencing all your life, from then until now. To-day your life has in many senses been a failure, and through your own acts."

We then turned to the man, saying:

"Sir, your life has been marked with wonderful changes. Your fifteenth, nineteenth, twenty-second, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh and thirtieth years are all important in your life-record. Your influences are from all parts of the world. You too, have been a failure through causes superinduced by yourself. Your opportunities have been more than ordinary."

We then took up each date in detail, giving minute descriptions of events and parties. Turning to them, we said:

"All this is from the spirit of a man who was your watchful friend and well-wisher. He died suddenly."

We then gave a full description of the man, and the initials of his name. The spirit then turned to her and spoke words of severe advice. This test produced a great excitement, and most marked influence. The lady was led away by her friend. It was every word true.

We gave one hundred and sixty-five tests in Lake City; one hundred and forty fully identified on the spot. We had a fine dinner of speckled trout presented us by Brother Myers, a good Spiritualist, and like Peter, a good fisherman.

After we left, we learned that Brother Jamieson had a discussion on hand, of considerable importance.

Lake City is a live town, and full of Spiritualists.

E. V. Wilson's Appointments for Dec. 1871

We will speak in Philadelphia the Sundays, and on Monday evenings of Jan. 1872. Please remember the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

(CONCLUDED FROM FIRST PAGE.)

periences in the darkened room were in all material respects the same as at the former sitting. When the lamp was lit, the spirits were prompt in putting in their appearance. Several strange faces were presented, some male and others female, but none that were recognized. Finally a face appeared that resembled the gold-spectacled ghost of the morning sitting, though without the spectacles. He was pressed to give his name, and finally responded in a clear, bold tone, "Paine." This left the company as much in a quandary as ever, and the desire was expressed for his given name. Was it Tom Paine, or what Paine was it? The ghost evaded the question, but continued to play hide-and-seek from behind the curtain, occasionally as he showed himself indulging in some fancied witticism. At length, as the company persisted in knowing his full name, he changed his base and announced it as "Solomon Saul Josephus."

SPIRITUAL WIT.

One of the New York ladies, who had evidently come hoping to see and communicate with a departed friend of the masculine fraternity, persisted in her inquiries if such a spirit was present, and urgently requesting that he would show himself. The witty ghost, Solomon Saul Josephus, however, persisted in monopolizing the stage and time, and in reply to the lady's inquiries, kindly told her that she had male friends enough without calling for others from the spirit world. One of the gentlemen present wanted to get some information about a female spirit, but was told that he ran too much after the women. These and similar brilliant and profound observations occupied the time of the spirit for over half an hour, when he withdrew, and the performance was concluded.

The reporter remained for another day, and had other interviews, but none of a more satisfactory nature, nor which need be particularly described. He then left the village, and was gone four days, when he returned unexpectedly on a morning train, and proceeded at once to the spiritual resort, determined to prosecute the investigation until he should be able to explode the humbug. He found an entirely new company waiting at the house, and a circle was at once formed. In this circle was a gentleman from Syracuse, and, judging from his conversation, evidently an official of some sort. When the show commenced, a face was presented that was entirely different from any the reporter had previously seen. This face the Syracuse gentleman recognized as that of a man named Butler, a few weeks previously in that city. To make the recognition complete, the Syracuse gentleman asked the apparition to show the side of his head. The side view was given, disclosing a horrid gash on and back of the temple, from which the blood was apparently streaming. This was considered satisfactory evidence of identity, the Syracusan pronouncing the wound precisely such a one as Butler had received. The ghost was then asked by the gentleman if the party in arrest was the murderer. The murdered ghost promptly responded, "Yes: hold on to the d——d louse."

WHO HAD BEEN MURDERED

After this, the face of a very pretty girl appeared; but as it was not recognized, it was withdrawn. Then appeared a most lovely, though strangely sad female face, apparently of a lady just verging on womanhood. The features were all fully developed and were exquisitely beautiful. The eyes were large and lustrous; the nose a full Grecian; the mouth symmetrical and tempting. The complexion was not that of a corpse, though it was wondrously clear, while the whole expression of the face was one of extreme sadness. The apparition excited the liveliest sensations among the beholders, and all leaned forward to inspect it closer. It appeared several times, but each appearance coming further into the light, until all had satisfied themselves of the reality of the vision. Then it was asked to give its name. The lips moved as if attempting to pronounce a name, but no sound came from them. Again and again it appeared, at each appearance, renewing the effort to speak. Finally a whisper was heard, and all ears were bent to catch it. The whisper was repeated a little louder, and finally so loud that all heard it distinctly and understood it alike. It was a name familiar to the reporter, and sacred to him, though the face was certainly not familiar, and, though not wholly dissimilar, would not be that of the lady named.

ANOTHER SEANCE.

On the following morning the reporter took a resident of the village with him to witness the manifestations. This gentleman had lived a number of years in Moravia, and knew all the inhabitants; but he was not a believer in Spiritualism, and had never visited this house. He was invited in order that if there was any deception practiced, and these were real faces, as they seemed to be, he might detect them. A circle was duly formed, and remained in waiting two hours; but the ghosts obstinately refused to appear, and an adjournment was finally forced upon the company by fatigue. Mr. Keeler seemed greatly mortified at this failure, the more so because of the presence of the village gentleman, whom he urged to come again in the afternoon. The reporter felt persuaded that he had now found a clue to the mystery, and went away with his companion. But in the afternoon they concluded to try it once more, and renewed the call. The circle was formed as in the morning. During the usual performance in the darkened room a male voice appeared directly in the midst of the company, speaking in the German tongue. Nobody present understood German, and therefore the communication was unintelligible. It was then explained by Mr. Keeler that Dr. North, who was present the previous week, had held a long conversation with this or some other Teutonic ghost. Again the voice appeared and repeated his unintelligible message, but as he got no response after due waiting he seemed to get impatient, and found a more satisfied audience when he suddenly broke out with the words,

"Strike a light!"

The light was struck with surprising quickness, but the ghost had vanished. The medium then entered the cabinet and the show began, unfolding the the reporter had yet witnessed. First of all, [illegible] of a middle-aged man—a new face—[illegible]ented. This was followed by a hand, [illegible]ily grasping something, and moving [illegible]d forth across the opening. While [illegible]tomime was enacting the medium an[illegible]l from within the cabinet that she could discern something bright in the spirit's hand, and that he was drawing it across his throat. On closer inspection this was seen to be the case, the man or spirit was apparently cutting his throat. The question was then asked, who of the company had lost a friend by suicide? but no one responded. While endeavoring to find out for which particular one of the witnesses this manifestation was intended, a hand was thrust out and with extended finger, pointing in the direction of the reporter and the gentleman who accompanied him. As the Moravia gentleman seemed most clearly indicated, the company unanimously decided that it must mean him. In order to be certain he asked the question if this exhibition was intended for him. In response the hand reappeared and pointed directly at the reporter.

MOST REMARKABLE AND STARTLING PROGRAMME

"Is this pantomime for my edification?" the reporter asked.

Thereupon a great muscular arm was thrust out, away up to the shoulder, and with clenched fist gave three powerful blows on the partition above the opening. This was an unmistakable arm, one of unusual length even for a man. It was clad in white, the material being gathered at the wrist into a narrow band which was buttoned or otherwise fastened.

"Is the tragedy you are representing one in which I am interested?" asked the reporter, anxious to solve the riddle.

In reply a hand appeared and waved an affirmative answer.

"Does it relate to any relative of mine?"

A negative reply was received by the same means.

"Does it relate to any friend of mine?"

The negative reply was repeated.

"Is it an affair in which I have been professionally interested?"

The same hand waved an affirmative.

"Has it anything to do with

THE NATHAN MURDER?"

A negative reply was received.

"Has it any connection with the Alice Bowlsby case?"

Another negative reply.

"Is it the case of a male or female?"

Here the reporter was reminded by the Spiritualists present that if he asked a double question the spirits could not answer it. He then modified his question.

"Does the manifestation relate to a man?"

A negative reply.

"Then it must be a female?"

At this a delicate hand appeared, holding a handkerchief of surprising whiteness, and with every indication of gladness, portrayed by the rapid and emphatic manner in which she waved the signal, replied affirmatively.

The reporter asked for further information, confessing his inability to imagine what the pantomime meant. Some little delay ensued, which Mr. Keeler said was caused by the spirits preparing to explain the matter more clearly. Pretty soon the curtain rose again, and the upper part of an arm, torn off at the shoulder, was thrust out. This was followed by an undistinguishable object shown within the opening, but which, by particular request, was afterward brought more into the light, and proved to be a portion of a female bust, with a mangled and bleeding shoulder, and the arm missing. Again the curtain rose and fell, when a corpse, arrayed in a shroud of almost shining whiteness, lying upon its back, and seemingly borne upon a litter, was passed several times before the opening. It was to the eye of the beholder of small figure. The features could not be seen with sufficient distinctness to be described. This display seemed to terminate the pantomimic tragedy enacted for the benefit of the reporter, and left him as much mystified as ever. Several faces were subsequently shown, at one time two together. There were also four hands shown at once, three full sized, with fingers moving, coming up from below, and the fourth, that of a child, coming down from above. Finally a fifth hand, with the middle finger lacking, was shown, and the performance was ended.

THE CORPSE OF A YOUNG LADY

When the door was opened to let the medium out from the cabinet, the reporter stood ready, with lamp in hand, to enter. He noticed that Mrs. Andrews was dressed very plainly, with a tight-fitting waist, and a skirt without hoops, hanging rather closely to her person. He could, of course, make no more searching examination of her. Within the cabinet nothing could be discovered but the chair in which the medium had sat, and the tin speaking trumpet. The fastenings to the windows were perfect and secure.

NO TRAP DOORS

could be discovered anywhere. The paper pasted over the cracks in the board partition was torn off in search of concealed wires, but none could be found. It thus became manifest that, if deception was practiced, the medium performed it without the aid of accomplices. And if she practiced this deception, how could she conceal about her person all the masks, arms, hands, and other paraphernalia essential to the varied performance that had just been witnessed?

The reporter was reluctantly compelled to confess himself baffled, and came away unsatisfied.

A Name Forgotten, and a Letter Mislaid.

The Quaker Brother who sent us fifteen dollars, will take notice that his letter, by accident, was mislaid before being entered upon our books and his name and post-office address is not known; the money was equally divided—five dollars was placed to the credit of the Widow's and Orphan's Fund—five was sent to Mrs. Lou Kimball, editor Lyceum Banner, and five to Col. D. M. Fox, editor of Present Age.

Will the brother advise us of his address.

NOTICE.—Any one who has sent any sum of money which properly should be credited to the Widow's and Orphan's Fund, but which does not appear there, will oblige by advising us of that fact.

It may be, in the general confusion, that we have failed to make such credits in some cases. We wish to do so in all cases. Many letters came while we were absent in New York, and mistakes of the kind referred to may have occurred, which we shall be most happy to correct.

THE BANNER OF LIGHT is for sale at this office, 156 4th Avenue.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

On next Monday evening, Nov. 27, Chicago will be favored with a lecture from one of the deepest thinkers of the present age. Mr. Emerson will lecture under the auspices of the Star Lecture Course, at the Michigan Ave. Free Library, taking for his subject "Nature and Art." The name of the lecturer will be sufficient to draw out a crowded house. The price of admission is only 50 cents; reserved seats, 75 cents. Course tickets, for four lectures, $1.60. Rev. John Lord, Mark Twain, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton will lecture on succeeding Monday evenings.

"God in the Constitution."

The article from the pen of D. W. Hull, on the above subject, is well worthy of a careful perusal. He has handled the subject in a most able manner.

THE last work by Robert Dale Owen, "The Debatable Land between this World and the Next," is destined to create a great sensation among all liberal minds. It is full of incidents illustrative of the beauties of our philosophy.

REPLY TO INQUIRIES.—We do not acknowledge ordinary receipts of subscriptions, in the JOURNAL, only extraordinary donations which are credited to the Widows' and Orphans' Fund. All other receipts for the JOURNAL will appear when we get the mailing galleys set up anew.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON, the healing and business medium, can be found at her residence, 148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

Hon. J. W. Edmonds.

The above-named brother has kindly donated one hundred copies of his tracts to this House, for which we tender our thanks, and place the same to the credit of the Widows and Orphans Fund; and that class will receive the same free on application by letter or in person.

F. L. Thayer, the Medium.

Bro. Thayer, the physical medium, informs us that his old band of spirits had returned, and that he would soon be before the public again.
